Jewish Life

A leader who bridged two worlds

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

The following is a historical fact, albeit one that may seem stranger than fiction: Toledo, Spain, the centre of Spanish Jewry, once appointed as its head rabbi a Jew of the Ashkenazi tradition. We may think that throughout history, Jews have lived scattered and in isolated pockets with little or no connection to each other. This story will demonstrate that this was not the case, even many centuries ago.

The story of the 13th century Maharam, Rabbi Meir of Rothenberg, also known as the Me'or Hagolah, the light of the Diaspora, is both fascinating and tragic. This man was the undisputed leader of all of medieval German Jewry at the time when that area was ruled by a collection of landowners or lords who were virtually minor kings. One of these feudal lords took the Maharam captive and asked for an exorbitant amount of money in exchange for his release.

Communities all over Germany quickly responded by raising vast sums of money, in order to secure the release of the revered leader. But the Maharam himself quickly declared that they were not to do this, on the grounds that a new norm would ensue, one in which Jews would henceforth be captured, and further exorbitant ransoms demanded.

The Jews nevertheless went on with the fundraising.

During this time, the lord had designated another rabbi, a disciple of the Maharam, Rabbeinu Asher ben Yehiel, known as the Rosh, as personal guarantor that these funds would be delivered. Unfortunately, before the money was all collected, the Maharam, an aged man became gravely ill and passed away while yet incarcerated.

Nevertheless, notwithstanding the passing of the Maharam, the lord demanded the full ransom, claiming that it was no fault of his that the old rabbi had died in jail.

On hearing this, the Rosh, fearing for his own life, quickly fled Germany. At first, he went to France, but he was afraid of the influence and power of the lord, even there, and the Rosh continued on to the safe distance of Spain.

When the Rosh arrived in Toledo, the Jewish community realized who he was. He was immediately appointed rabbi over the entire city, a position that effectively made him the rabbinic authority of all of Spain.

Although the customs of the Rosh were, of course, those of the Germanic Ashkenazi Jews, he, and later his son, became the leaders and teachers of Spanish Sephardi Jewry.

This all took place before the authoritative Shulchan Aruch – the Code of Jewish Law – was written and became the halachic standard for Sephardim as well as for Ashkenazim. Many a law and custom practised today by Jews of Spanish descent derive not just from the Spanish Sephardi tradition of the Shulchan Aruch, but also from the Germanic Ashkenazi tradition that came from the Rosh's teachings and influence. In this way, the Rosh acted as a bridge between the two traditions.

So strong was his influence, in fact, that among Sephardim, the surname Ben HaRosh – descendant of the Rosh – is not an uncommon last name.

A gift that bridged two generations

When I teach Canadian Jewish history, I begin by asking who among my students was born in Canada. A good percentage, but certainly not all, of the teens raise their hands.

Next, I ask whose parents were born in Canada, and a few of the hands come down. Then I ask whose grandparents were born in Canada. A few hands remain raised. By the time I ask about great-grandparents, there are rarely any hands left in the air.

Class Act
By Daniel Held

Much of my family fled Germany in the final days before World War II, finding refuge in every corner of the world. Two of my grandparents landed in South Africa and one in England. After the war, wherever my British grandfather travelled, he would search local telephone directories for lost members of the family. In Argentina and America, and across Europe and Israel, he slowly reunited relatives who had been lost during the war years.

My father left South Africa in the early 1970s in search of political liberties, economic opportunities and a fresh start for himself and his future family. He first lived in England, and, after he met and married my mother, they moved together to Canada. Their story is not unlike that of many immigrants. With political and economic dreams unrealized, they sought out a new country with new opportunities.

With my family growing in Canada, my grandparents would make voyages to come visit. For my South African grandparents, it meant eight-week trips to Canada during the summers, half the time staying at my house and half the time at my aunt's. Despite these visits, and the phone calls and letters during the intervening months, my grandparents were still distant relatives.

Ten years after my parents' arrival in Canada, my English grandmother immigrated for entirely different reasons. After living in England her entire life, she had a comfortable network of friends and relatives. She was well established in her community and had a flourishing social life filled with activities and social gatherings.

But despite her warm community of friends and family, my grandmother felt that her life in England could not be complete if her children and grandchildren were an ocean away. When she was almost 70, she packed up her life in England and came to Canada.

Here, she set out to make a new life for herself. She took golf lessons, learned tai chi and found a group of friends with whom she would go downtown each week. At the centre of this new life were her grandchildren.

Unlike the immigration stories of my parents and my other grandparents, my grandmother wasn't fleeing England. Rather, she was moving to Canada.

Today, we continue to be wandering Jews. My friends have begun their own journeys, some making aliyah to Israel, others moving to America, Europe and elsewhere.

Yet, today, the distances seem to have shrunk. When my parents arrived in Canada, the Internet wasn't even imagined, they couldn't afford long distance calls, and a mail strike cut off their last form of connection with home. Now, pictures and videos are shared instantly over the Internet, and crossing the ocean for a visit is far easier. I even know grandparents in Canada who babysit their grandchildren in Israel using a webcam and Skype.

Despite the shrinking of the world, the distances are still great. A bedtime story over Skype is not a hug in person. Singing happy birthday over the phone is not a sleepover at grandma's.

I am forever indebted to my grandmother for her move. Having her nearby – close enough to hug and close enough to build a special relationship with, something I didn't have with my other grandparents – was one of the most precious gifts I could ever have been given.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

The Iranian revolution's effect on a family

Books
Bernard Baskin

This debut novel by a young Iranian-American (now available in paperback) is a heart-rending story of religious brutality, harsh imprisonment and a family's attempt to seek refuge in a safer country.

The author knows what she is writing about. In 1980, when she was 10 years old, she and her family were forced to flee Iran.

At the beginning of this novel, Isaac Amin, a 60-year-old Jewish gemologist, is arrested in his jewelry shop by armed revolutionaries. His wife of 25 years is forced to face loutish house-inspecting soldiers and office looters.

The book's simple plot is immediately engaging: what will become of Isaac Amin? Will he die by accident or illness or torture? What allows one prisoner to survive while his cellmate faces the firing squad? Meanwhile, outside the prison, Farnaz searches for her husband and struggles to maintain the household: will she get word of him? Will she and her daughter escape the scrutiny of the Revolutionary Guards?

The ironies of the Amins' lives are evident to themselves: under the shah's regime the family enjoyed privilege and prosperity. Farnaz is the willing victim of her material possessions that recall for her, a variety of times and places. "When Isaac would be at work and the children at school, she would sit in her sun-filled living rooms and look at each one – the glass case, a reminder of Francesca, in Venice; the copper plate, a souvenir of Ismet, in Istanbul; the silver teapot, a keepsake from Firouz, in Isfahan. Living among these objects assured her that hers was a populated world."

Isaac's son, living in Brooklyn, finds work with a chassidic family. But he is persuaded to give up a relationship with his chassidic landlord's daughter. He protests. "But I am also a Jew, Mr. Mendelson, would it be so terrible for Rachel to end up with me?"

But he is rejected with this rejoinder, "You're a Jew, yes. But let me speak frankly here. If the two of you marry, the chances of her giving up chassidic practices are much higher than you taking them on. So slowly your union, as innocent as it may seem, will dilute the religion, watering it down so much that in three or four generations what was once heavy cream will only be skim milk."

Although the book includes episodes of torture, the author's approach is muted rather than melodramatic. When Amin, stunned and transformed, returns to his family, his wife receives only oblique answers to her questions. 'When she lies down next to him on the bed, he is already asleep. Looking at his beard closely she sees the blisters under the hair and understands why he has not shaved... she unrolls his sock and discovers his swollen foot, one toe bluish, the soles marked by unhealed lacerations. Looking at the foot she realizes that she will never know what happened to him – even after he has described it all down to the last detail.'

Sofer is a superb writer, particularly skilful in describing the sensual experiences of her characters and the colours, scents and sounds of Tehran. After Farnaz visits the local prison in search of her husband, she walks for a long time through the city. "Summer is leaving, and with it, the buzz of ceiling fans, the smell of wet dust rising through the air-conditioning vents, the clink of noontime dishes heard through open windows, the chatter of families passing long, muggy afternoons in courtyards, eating pumpkin seeds and watermelon."

Highly readable and difficult to forget, The Septembers of Shiraz is both a timely and gripping work.

Jewish distance learning, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we began our look at universities and other institutions that offer distance learning courses on the Internet. Today, some online courses that won't get you a master's degree but will round out your Jewish education. Since most of these courses are free, you won't usually get ongoing input from a teacher. On the other hand, you can do these courses at your own pace, many courses offer discussion areas where you can share your thoughts with other students… and the price is right.

But first, what is it like to participate in worldwide classroom? A while back, Massachusetts-based Hebrew College posted these comments from one of its students: "When I describe our class to other people, I'm sure they think I'm a little crazy to be so entranced by a bunch of people I've never met. I try to visualize all of us typing away at keyboards all over the world, at all times of day, and it's as if I finally understand why spider silk, nearly invisible, is one of the strongest natural fibres. We're spinning line after line on our own, releasing words that are then caught and webbed together in a sticky, translucent net. One edge hooked over Jerusalem, the other stretched over Cambridge… I just wish we could have a huge party where we could guess each other's identity based on one simple hint." [tinyurl.com/whyonline]

Torah.org offers more than 40 classes on topics ranging from the Book of Jonah to the Ethics of Speech based on the classic works of the Chofetz Chaim. [torah.org/learning] One of the most stimulating courses is titled Honesty: Every week an ethical question like this one is posted: "If the motel operator says they accept three children in a room, can you bring a fourth?" You can send your views to the Honesty Forum, and the following week, Rabbi Yisroel Belsky sends out his response – and poses a new question. [torah.org/learning/honesty]

At Jewish Interactive Studies, participants correspond with a Jerusalem-based staff to learn more about a variety of Jewish topics. These courses last one to two months and start throughout the year. The Jewish Ethics course Getting Along with People – and Yourself uses material from Maimonides, Rabbi Yonah and the Talmud to examine a Jewish view of the work ethic, strife and anger and wealth and happiness. [jewishstudies.org]

MyJewishLearning.com offers courses on kashrut, tzedakah, free will, Kabbalah and mysticism and much more. [tinyurl.com/myjewish] If you'd prefer to learn by listening, TeachItToMe.com offers more than 3,000 lessons on topics ranging from Medicine in Halachah to the Shabbat Crash Course. [teachittome.com] Closer to home, Rabbi Yossi Michalowicz of Thornhill, Ont.'s Westmount Community Shul offers a huge selection of audio classes, including an Introduction to Kabbalah, The Laws of Brachos, and Marriage: God's Sense of Humour. [tinyurl.com/westmount]

Although most online courses are geared toward adults, I came across one site that hasn't forgotten kids. The New South Wales Board of Jewish Education has created 250 online lessons geared to kids from kindergarten to Grade 6. Lesson are free, but there's a fee if you want to play the related quizzes and games. [tinyurl.com/kidslearn]

Pikuach nefesh overrides other mitzvot, rabbi says

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

There are 613 mitzvot in the Torah that Jews should strive to observe, but there is one in particular that overrides any other obligation, said Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau.

"What is the greatest commandment? Yom Kippur? Shabbat? Kashrut? Of the 613 commandments, all of these commandments are on the second line if they are in competition with another law, the holiness of life, what we call pikuach nefesh," said Rabbi Lau, the former Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel and current chief rabbi of Tel Aviv who was in Toronto earlier this month as guest of honour at a benefit dinner for the Ezer Mizion Bone Marrow Registry, held at the Windsor Arms Hotel.

Ezer Mizion, which Rabbi Lau described as a "magnificent" organization, is an Israeli non-profit group that saves lives and offers medical and social support services to help ailing, disabled, elderly and underprivileged Israelis.

Its bone marrow donor registry, which is the largest Jewish registry in the world, was founded in 1998. Ten years later, it boasts a list of almost 400,000 potential donors.

At the dinner, Rabbi Lau, who last week was appointed chair of the council of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority – an honorary body of 120 people that meets once a year – spoke about the importance of the organization that saves lives and the mitzvah of pikuach nefesh.

"Shabbat, Yom Kippur, Pesach, if they come in conflict with the question of survival, if they are in a clash with the desire of living, of existence – the Torah says, these are laws, commandments that a being has to observe and live accordingly. To live, not to die," said Rabbi Lau, the youngest survivor of the Buchenwald concentration camp.

Rabbi Lau immigrated to Israel when he was eight with his older brother after the war. His uncle and half brother were the only other family members who survived the Holocaust.

He received his rabbinical ordination in 1971 and was later chief rabbi of Netanya and chief Ashkenazi rabbi of Tel Aviv before serving as chief Ashkenazi rabbi of Israel from 1993 to 2003.

In 2005, he was re-elected chief rabbi of Tel Aviv, and in that year, he received the Israel Prize Lifetime Achievement award for "bridging rifts in Israeli society."

At the dinner, Rabbi Lau reiterated the fact that preserving life is the holiest commandment in the Torah.

"Not only that you should not take his life, not only that you should help him to exist, but you are forbidden to stay on the sidelines and not to do everything possible to save a human being's life, whoever it may be – a Jew or an Arab, a Christian or a Muslim."

Speaking in advance of the dinner, Ofra Konikoff, the Ezer Mizion registry's transplant co-ordinator, said raising money for the registry is important because it serves Jews around the world, since donors and recipients need to be genetically compatible.

"Once you enlarge the registry, you enlarge the chances of finding a match," Konikoff said.

"Daily, we get files of patients from all over the world who are looking for matches and if we find a match we recruit the stem cells from the bone marrow, and it goes to the patient wherever they are being hospitalized."

Konikoff said that when the registry was founded 10 years ago, it only had 5,000 samples.

Having surpassed the halfway point toward the goal of reaching 700,000 samples, she said she is very proud, but the registry still has a long way to go.

In 2005, in an effort to speed up the process of reaching that goal, Ezer Mizion partnered with the Israeli Defence Forces to recruit blood samples from soldiers on their very first day in the army, Konikoff said.

"They are invited to the clinic to come and give us a blood sample, and the blood samples are being tissue typed and the results are being put in our data."

She said that Rabbi Lau has always been a vocal supporter of the registry and always helps to promote it when he has the time.

"He is a great supporter of this project, because he knows that it saves Jewish lives, and he thinks that saving a life is the biggest mitzvah."

JNF to fete second-generation power couple

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

For the first time in 60 years, a husband and wife who have served as presidents of the Toronto and the Canadian arms of the Jewish National Fund will be the honorees at Toronto's Negev Dinner.

Community leaders Alan and Sandy (Tater) Posluns both come from families steeped in a commitment to volunteerism and charitable work.

"Our parents gave us a profound sense of responsibility for our people and the State of Israel," Sandy said.

"We are delighted that we are continuing in the footsteps of our parents. The icing on the cake and making this event even more meaningful to us is to be honoured on the occasion of the 60th anniversary of the State of Israel and the 60th Negev Dinner in Toronto."

The Posluns will be feted for their communal leadership and dedication to Israel on Sunday, Nov. 23, at the Sheraton Centre Hotel.

Alan is a second-generation Negev Dinner honoree. His father, Abe Posluns, was recognized in 1984 for his contributions to the community, including his leadership in helping to build Baycrest Centre.

A Toronto native, Alan is a graduate of the Wharton School of Business and Finance. He served as president and CEO of Superior Acceptance Corporation and is a past president of the Association of Canadian Financial Corporations.

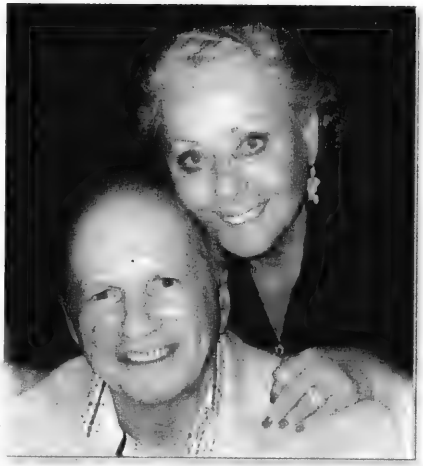
"When I graduated from Wharton and returned to Toronto, my father introduced me to Baycrest, where he was president for 25 years – quite an accomplishment," Alan said.



Alan and Sandy Posluns

"On a trip to Israel with my father, and [after] becoming involved when he was the Negev Dinner honoree, Sandy and I got deeply involved in JNF, something that has grown over the years."

Alan has served on many committees at Baycrest, where he is a life director. He has also served as treasurer of the Israel Cancer Research Fund.

Sandy's involvement in communal service began in 1975, when she joined the Noar Chapter of Hadassah-WIZO.

"I met all these wonderful and accomplished women at Hadassah who worked for a goal, and I learned a great deal from them," she said in an interview. "This led me to many areas of need in the Jewish community."

For more than three decades, Sandy served at both the local and national levels of Hadassah-WIZO, and in 1984, she was chair of Toronto's legendary Hadassah Bazaar.

As well, she has worked in many areas of Baycrest's Women's Auxiliary, as well as on the board of directors of Baycrest. She has also been involved at Mount Sinai Hospital and served as chair of the Mount Sinai Ball in 1988 and 1989.

"My mother, who recently passed away, was a devoted volunteer at Baycrest for 14 years," she noted.

Sandy said that her trips to Israel have enhanced her commitment to JNF.

"It's very rewarding to be this year's Negev Dinner honorees, because we've put our hearts into JNF. We fell in love with the work of JNF in Israel, particularly the Canadian influence."

Funds raised at this year's dinner will go to the Blue Valley Park in the names of Sandy and Alan Posluns. The park is located in Safed-Meron, near the Galilee hills.

Sandy said she is pleased that the park will have playgrounds and picnic areas for family outings.

The dinner will feature a unique march of Canadian, Israeli and JNF flags, as well as a performance by the student choir from United Synagogue Day School.

"We are very excited about being honoured at the Negev Dinner and for our children to be there to continue the momentum of being involved in the community – from generation to generation," Sandy said.

Na'amat a family affair for new president

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

At Rivka Shaffir's recent installation as president of Na'amat Canada, she left at each table a picture of a group of women that included her mother and Golda Meir.

"These women attended Jewish functions, stood on street corners collecting small donations and held bazaars in order to raise money for the women and children of Israel.

"I remember them vividly. In a matter of speaking [we were all] part of a large, extended family," said Shaffir, 60, now the principal of and a teacher at the Hamilton Hebrew Academy.

Growing up, she said, she was active in the Labour Zionist youth movement, and her father was a member and officer of the Farband Labour Zionist organization.

"Now my daughter is an active member of Na'amat in Montreal. The Yiddish expression, dos epelleh falt nisht veit foon baymelle (the apple does not fall far from the tree) [certainly] applies in our family."

Shaffir said that teaching and Na'amat are her two passions. "They both involve children, and they're both about creating a better world. I'm taking on this challenge with a full heart.

"It's not totally up to me, though. My role is to be a leader, and to knit people together. [The organization] does not rest solely on my shoulders."

Although Na'amat members no longer stand on street corners asking for donations, said Shaffir, "[we do need funds], and we must continue to develop more sophisticated approaches to raising money.

"We need to increase our efforts through small and large donations, and we need to nurture more personal relationships with our grassroot donors."

The organization must create positive experiences for the donors so they will share in the pride all Na'amat members have in the organization's work, she said.

Fundraising has also become more specific than in her mother's time, she said. "While the funds are largely aimed for projects in Israel, the projects target disadvantaged women and their families,which includes non-Jews, Muslims and Christians.

The organization has become sensitive to the needs of Canadian Jewish women as well, she said, and they are researching ways to attract them to Na'amat.

"The social experience must be emphasized. Since my chapter, Nitzan, was founded in Hamilton, we have socialized, participated in one another's simchahs, and provided support when necessary. There is a bond of friendship that permeates our meetings and activities, and that is rare in today's fast-paced world."

Leo Baeck

Director, Jewish Day School

The Leo Baeck Day School, a Reform Jewish Day School which serves the Greater Toronto Area, is seeking an energetic and charismatic Jewish leader for the position of Director. The Director will be a professional educator and/or leader with vision and will be responsible for implementing the mandate, mission and strategic plan of the school. He or she will build on the school's legacy of innovation and success and lead it strongly into the future.

The Leo Baeck Day School is the only Reform Jewish Day School in Canada. Founded in 1974, the school operates on two parallel campuses which together encompass over 800 students in Nursery through Grade 8.

Iran poses challenge for Obama

Not only did Barack Obama win a decisive victory in the U.S. presidential election, according to many news reports, he also enjoyed tremendous support in virtually every country in the world - with the exception of Israel.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

While few journalists bothered to explain Israel's unease, leaving the impression that Israelis did not favour the change that Obama represented, there were some exceptions.

In "Palestinians, Israelis see Obama differently" (Globe and Mail, Nov. 6), Patrick Martin interviewed Barry Rubin, director of research at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya, who explained: "My concern is that the Islamists will see Obama as weak and feel able to do what they want. Iran won't be afraid to develop nuclear weapons. Hezbollah won't be afraid to attack Israel, and Hamas will be the same."

During the election campaign, Obama indicated he would be willing to negotiate with Iranian leaders. However, after speaking with leaders in Israel and other Middle Eastern countries that feel threatened by a nuclear Iran, he reportedly gained a deeper appreciation of the threat Iran poses. In Israel, Obama again said that Iran must not be allowed to acquire nuclear weapons. However, he didn't deal with the issue of negotiations.

At Obama's Nov. 7 press conference, the only foreign policy question was about Iran. Obama used that opportunity to reiterate his key message: "Iran's development of a nuclear weapon, I believe, is unacceptable, and we have to mount an international effort to prevent that from happening."

The most extensive discussion about the U.S. election and Israeli attitudes toward Obama was an interview with Israeli writer and Middle East analyst Yossi Klein Halevi on CBC Radio's Sunday Edition (Nov. 9).

Klein Halevi, a senior fellow at the Jerusalem-based Shalem Center, spoke about his "schizophrenic" attitude toward Obama. As someone who grew up in the United States during the civil rights struggle, Klein Halevi said he was "deeply moved, and overwhelmed" by Obama's election victory. However, like many Israelis, he is concerned about how Obama will deal with the existential threat posed by a nuclear-armed Iran.

Klein Halevi remarked: "Soon, the next president of the U.S. is going to have to make the most fateful foreign policy decision that any American president has had to make in a generation... maybe since the Cuban missile crisis... A nuclear Iran will change the world we live in."

Referring to Israeli and French intelligence, which estimate that Iran could possess a nuclear bomb within 12 to 18 months, Klein Halevi said that Israelis believe the threat from Iran is simply too imminent for negotiations. If Obama had been elected four years ago, he noted, there might have been time to try "vigorous diplomacy, followed by strong sanctions." But now, Iran might use extended talks as a delaying tactic to push ahead with its nuclear program.

When questioned on this by the show's host Michael Enright, Klein Halevi did concede that it's perhaps important for Obama to show the international community that the United States is now willing to try negotiations. However, such talks must adhere to a "tight timetable" of a month or two, so as not to buy Iran more time. If talks fail, "vigorous economic sanctions" must be applied.

Klein Halevi stopped short of talking about the next step: military force.

That option was discussed in "A Crash Course for the New President," by Claus Christian Malzahn (Spiegel Online, Nov. 6). Reflecting a concern about Iran that is also shared in much of Europe today, Malzahn remarked: "Obama wants to negotiate with Iran, without preconditions, over termination of that country's nuclear program... But it will be just as difficult for Obama as it is for a Republican president to accept a concrete threat to Israel by Iranian nuclear warheads in combination with an Iranian president who dreams of wiping out Israel. If Iran continues to insist on its nuclear program and the conflict cannot be resolved with diplomacy, a U.S. attack on the country's nuclear facilities in the near future will be almost unavoidable. The commander-in-chief in that attack would be Barack Obama."

Author laments lost Jewish Moroccan language

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Yiddish isn't the only Jewish language that's threatened by extinction, Solly Lévy warns.

Lévy, a Sephardi Jew born in Tangiers, Morocco, who forged careers in teaching, consulting, playwriting, acting, and cantorial singing, was in Toronto earlier this month to promote his second book, El Libro de Selomo, which is written in Hakétia, a largely extinct Jewish Moroccan language.

At a Nov. 2 event held at Petah Tikva Congregation, Lévy read excerpts from his book and spoke about the history of the 500-year-old language.

The audience was also treated to a screening of A Sephardic Journey, a documentary by Donald Winkler about Lévy himself, through his own words, the words of his family and friends, and his students.

Lévy, who emigrated to Montreal in 1968, when Moroccan Jews were being targeted following Israel's victory in the Six Day War, said Hakétia is vulnerable because unlike Ladino, the Judeo-Spanish language, which has been written and published for centuries, Hakétia is largely oral.

Switching back and forth from Spanish to English, Lévy first explained the difference between Ladino – a Spanish dialect influenced by Hebrew and Aramaic, Arabic, Turkish and to a lesser extent Greek and spoken by Jews who lived in the Ottoman Empire – and Hakétia, a mix of old Spanish, Hebrew and Arabic, which was spoken on the northeast coast of Morocco.

"But the mere fact that I am addressing you in international Spanish and in English is a strong indication of the social status of Hakétia," he said.

"If I use this dialect – my mother tongue, of my grandmothers, my ancestors – in a serious academic talk, people will simply laugh at me."

He said that Jewish scholars from northern Morocco never wrote in Hakétia because, in spite of the Spanish Inquisition in 1492 when Jews were forced to convert or were expelled, Jews always felt a cultural link with Spain and wanted to write in the best Spanish of their times.

"This was strengthened by [Morocco's] geographical proximity, of course, to Spain, and on the other hand by the Spanish colonization of northern Morocco, established by the Treaty of Fez in 1912 and ending in 1956, the year of the declaration of Moroccan independence," Lévy said.

He said that Hakétia was considered the "language of the kitchens, able only to express emotions, never sophisticated enough to become a noble, highly intellectual form of communication."

He said it was considered a language the "underprivileged used to curse or bless, laugh or cry. The so-called high class citizens in our community did not allow their children to speak Hakétia. It was only recently, too late, that the baby boomers from northern Morocco showed some interest, or rather [paid] lip service, to the dialect of their elders."

Lévy spoke about a two-week cultural event in Paris last February that celebrated Moroccan Judaism.

Although there were lectures, concerts, discussions, art exhibits and film screenings about Moroccan Judaism, there was "not one single word about the northern Moroccan Jews. Not one single word about us. The word Hakétia was never pronounced nor written, not even once during those 14 days," he said.

"Even our own brothers, Moroccan Jews at large and Sephardim, do not know us, do not recognize our right to be recognized."

Before reading excerpts from his book, which had the audience laughing throughout, he urged members of his community to do what they can to preserve their heritage.

"Please do not forget your roots. Think about your roots and try to improve your Spanish, and do not relinquish the other part of the Jewish Moroccan culture."

Speakers express concern about future of Jewish culture

By SHLOMIT KRIGER
Special to The CJN

While the Jewish culture appears rich in today's world, with its synagogues, notable artistic works and education, there is room for improvement, said the two speakers at a recent talk on the Future of Jewish Culture.

The Nov. 6 event featured Ruth Calderon, founder and executive director of Israel's Alma College and author of The Market, the Home, the Heart, a book of personal interpretations of talmudic legends; and Steven Zipperstein, the Daniel E. Koshland professor in Jewish Culture and History at Stanford University and author of numerous books, including, most recently, a biography of American Jewish writer Isaac Rosenfeld.

Zipperstein pointed out that popular culture has absorbed many things Jewish, noting the free use of common Yiddish expressions in the U.S. media and the wealth of renowned Jewish entertainers and writers.

In contrast, however, he said, there are also some negative forces at play, including the Iranian nuclear threats against Israel and issues revolving around peace in the Jewish state, as well as the decline in the United States of the number of Jews and of the Jewish movement of the religious middle, Conservative Judaism.

Another concern for the future, he said, is that Jewish literature in the United States seems to indicate "a palpable distancing from Israel, a phenomenon that has been shrouded for some time by leading sociologists of U.S. Jewish life and is now echoed in significant new works of literature."

The most powerful example of such a book, Zipperstein said, is The Yiddish Policemen's Union, written by award-winning American author Michael Chabon. Released last year, the novel relates an alternative history detective story based on the premise that during World War II, a temporary Yiddish-speaking settlement for Jewish refugees was established in Alaska in 1941.

The story also includes the fictional destruction of the State of Israel in 1948 after an unsuccessful fight for independence. Israel's destruction is mentioned casually in only two sentences, while later in the book, Chabon writes that "the Holy Land has never seemed more remote or unattainable."

"Chabon's indifference to the fate of Israel struck me as deeply unsettling," Zipperstein said.

He went on to quote a study co-authored by University of California at Davis professor Ari Kelman titled Beyond Distancing: Young Adult American Jews and Their Alienation from Israel, which found that "Jews are identifying in ways that don't have anything to do with Israel.

"I feel that an inability to recognize the critical importance of what sovereignty has brought for Jews in the last half-century is to be utterly blind to one of the most extraordinary features of Jewish life," Zipperstein said.

Calderon talked about the evolution of Jewish culture more from a historical perspective. She noted that Judaism formerly revolved primarily around the Holy Temple and Jerusalem, where you would mainly find those who, it was believed, would "know how to manage the energy of God," such as rabbis.

Later, rabbis created the Torah texts, which allowed Jews to study and pray from wherever they resided.

Now, there has been another revolution, in Zionism, that Calderon feels she is living in and that Jews "must be partners in."

In order to be more immersed in our culture and be able to connect and interpret things, whether in the arts or in other areas, she believes that people need to become more knowledgeable through some of our great classic books, and especially through Hebrew

"The majority of Jews around the world have no connection to Hebrew," she said. "The wonderful art of interpreting the world and our lives through the Jewish language is something that I think brings meaning to Jewish life."

She would like to see more of these components included in the education provided at North American Jewish schools.

"Without great books, you cannot be a citizen of culture," she said. "The way I see Judaism, the work that we do is [to] interpret the world, and interpretation has to come from some base of knowledge.

"People that cannot be marinated in the Talmud, know the midrashim [interpretations of Jewish texts], enjoy or at least smell the Zohar, Haggadah, Chassidism, Kabbalah – you cannot do anything big if you don't have that in you."

Calderon stressed that another problem is that people from various communities and denominations stay within their own circles rather than unite, and that "kills the energy of machloket [debate over the Torah or other Jewish issues]."

"When you don't live with someone that you don't agree with, half of you doesn't work," she said. "We're all comfortable, and we take out things from the siddur that we don't like.

"We need communities to be open, curious and intrigued by each other."

Minsker chazzan credited for keeping shul alive

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Shmuel Spero, spiritual leader of Congregation Anshei Minsk, credits Cantor Ruben Schwebel for having kept the downtown synagogue alive in the years before the congregation and the area experienced a revitalization of Jewish life.

Cantor Schwebel, who served the Kensington Market shul for more than half a century, died unexpectedly at Baycrest on Nov. 8, almost two months after surgery for a broken hip. He was 92.

Rabbi Spero, who has been with the congregation since 1988, told The CJN that the cantor remained active at the synagogue even in recent years after becoming cantor emeritus.

"You might have thought he was 75," the rabbi said. "He was full of strength."

His yeshiva education was cut short by the outbreak of World War II, his son Allan said in a eulogy. One of the few Jewish officers in the Polish army, Schwebel fled to Russia following the Nazi invasion of Poland. He spent three years in a labour camp in Siberia, living on a meagre diet of black bread and an occasional bowl of herring soup cooked in snow, Allan said.

While in Siberia, Schwebel was arrested for conducting Jewish prayer services, "a testament to his unyielding faith despite all the adversity and risks."

Schwebel kept a record of the names of Jews who died there, and later gave them to Yad Vashem, said Rabbi Spero.

The rabbi remembers the cantor as a "very warm, very friendly" man, and a perfectionist as a chazzan. He enjoyed interacting with people at the shul and "wasn't too fazed by the difference in dress or mannerisms or notions of young people."

Cantor Ruben Schwebel

Schwebel met his wife Helen in Munich after the war. They were married in 1947, and left to join extended family in Toronto two years later with their daughter Ruthie, then six months old.

Schwebel's father, Zvi Avigdor (Harry) Schwebel, became the first mashgiach at the Murray House, a once-popular venue for weddings and bar mitzvahs. An uncle of the cantor's, Benny Schweibel, who had emigrated to the United States in the 1920s, was a cantor in Niagara Falls and Buffalo, N.Y.

Following his arrival in Toronto, Schwebel worked multiple jobs during the week, juggling them with his duties as a bar mitzvah teacher and cantor at Anshei Minsk.

Allan said his father lived for his family and the synagogue, taking great pride in his grandchildren. He said Schwebel had an optimistic outlook and a strong handshake, and was devout but also had "a performing side." Likewise, the chazzan's extensive collection of cantorial music ranged from traditional to "on the Hollywood side."

Schwebel's grandson, Evan Gold, who also spoke at the funeral, said that he and his grandfather bonded over hockey. "He was a huge hockey fan."

Schwebel leaves Helen, his wife of 61 years; daughter Ruth Gold and son Allan Schwebel; grandchildren Evan, Jessica and Caitlin Gold, and Danielle and Talia Schwebel; and sister Blima Dym. He was predeceased by his sisters Mala, Fayge and Gittel, who died in the Holocaust, and by his brothers Jack and Abie.

Holocaust memories were secret in Soviet Union

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In the Soviet Union, public recognition of Jewish suffering in the Holocaust was strongly discouraged, but Jewish survivors kept the memory of the Holocaust alive by telling their stories to their children and grandchildren.

"It was a remarkable example of private resistance against a dominant ideology. The stories became family secrets," Anna Shternshis, a Russian-born professor of Russian history and Jewish studies at the University of Toronto, told an audience in Winnipeg on Nov. 9. They were gathered to commemorate the 70th anniversary of Kristallnacht.

Shternshis said that the party line in the Soviet Union was that everyone suffered during the war, and, therefore, no particular ethnic group should be singled out for its suffering at the hands of the Germans. After all, an estimated 25 million Soviet citizens were killed during the war, and the Jewish dead were an estimated 1.5 million.

It is an attitude that hasn't changed in the post-Soviet states, Shternshis noted.

Yuri, who was born in Romanov, Ukraine, in 1921, couldn't understand why Soviet Jews were prevented from honouring their Jewish family members and friends who were murdered by the Nazis and their collaborators, Shternshis said.

She met Yuri and interviewed him about 10 years ago, in Brooklyn, N.Y. She would not reveal his last name as she said it would destroy the confidentiality of her interview with him.

Shternshis told her audience that his small apartment was awash in papers, as he had extensively documented the lives of Jewish residents of Romanov. All of them had been shot by the Nazis and their collaborators in 1942.

Yuri served with the Red Army during the war. On his return to Romanov in 1947, he found that nobody he knew had survived. He found work in town as a mechanic and set about recording the stories of how the Jews of Romanov died.

"Yuri quickly discovered that the townspeople, including collaborators, were quite willing to describe what had happened," Shternshis said. "He collected over 10,000 pages of notes about the fate of Romanov's 3,000 Jewish families."

Yuri and some of his friends raised money to build a monument in memory of the Romanov Jewish victims of the Nazis. He envisaged the monument's inscription to be in Russian, Ukrainian and Yiddish. It took 15 years before he received approval to erect the monument, and the monument's text was in Russian and Ukrainian. No mention of the victims' Jewishness was allowed, either. Local political leaders in Romanov have never attended the yearly memorial service, Shternshis said.

Yuri immigrated to the United States in 1988, after the fall of communism, she said. The next year, Yiddish was added to the memorial.

Shternshis also told the story of a Russian partisan leader, Nikolai Kiselev, who led 210 Jews on a 2,000-kilometre walk to safety. After the war, ensconced in a safe bureaucratic job, he refused to talk about what he had done and discouraged any acknowledgment. It remained his – and his Jewish wife's – secret until 20 years after he died and his daughter came across his diaries.

"Many Soviet Jewish survivors spent their lives hiding their past," Shternshis said. "One woman who survived would only talk about her experiences with her mother, who is also a survivor. She never told her children."

Shternshis spoke about another survivor, Svetlana Kogan Rabinowitch. Married at 16 in 1945, Rabinowitch didn't talk about the war, either. But in the mid-1950s, she asked her brother-in-law, an artist before the war who lost his legs and an arm and had become an alcoholic, to paint scenes of what she had been through. When Rabinowitch immigrated to Canada in 1988, she brought with her more than 50 large paintings. She plans to donate them to the National Gallery in Ottawa after she dies.

"She realized that in Canada, survivors can talk openly about the Holocaust," Shternshis said. "She and other Soviet Jewish survivors in North America believe that it is their mission to raise awareness about what happened to them."

New group launched

"We would like to create an organization that speaks for the Canadian Conservative community across Canada.

"Our goal is to provide the services that synagogues can't do themselves, leveraging multiple synagogues and the strength of multiple voices."

As well, he said, the council wants to invest in programming that will bring together the community, and evolve as a politically active voice for Conservative Judaism in Ottawa.

The council is still working on a definition of criteria that synagogues must meet to become members, Schiller said.

He added that the new council is not in competition with the USCJ. "We're hoping we can work in harmony to build the Conservative movement in Canada together."

Kochberg believes that recent events have deeply divided the Conservative community, a perception Schiller doesn't share.

Instead, he sees both organizations as legitimate voices of the Conservative movement.

"USCJ is not the Conservative movement," Schiller said. He noted that in Spain, Conservative congregations left Masorti, the Conservative umbrella organization outside North America, to start their own organization.

Schiller also said that representatives of non-CCCS synagogues have been attending its meetings as well, and participating in strategic planning. "They're part of the council, but not members."

Tanenbaum – a former executive director of the USCJ's Canadian region – said the new council is not asking USCJ-affiliated synagogues to leave the United Synagogue. However, they are invited to attend CCCS meetings and have input.

The council has a bylaw stating that its board "may take into account financial obligations" of members continuing USCJ membership and "shall make its best efforts to accommodate such members so as to enable them to maintain memberships in the corporation and the USCJ."

All CCCS fees will remain in Canada for programming, said Tanenbaum. "That's a very important piece," she added, "because 50 per cent of the regional [USCJ] dues went to support the entire United Synagogue. It went to New York."

The fees will be based on synagogue's income and/or expenses, said Tanenbaum.

"הייתי רוצה לחיות הפוך. אתה מתחיל כמו מי שכבר מת, ובכך מסיים את הקטע המפחיד הזה. אחר כך אתה קם בבית הקברות ומרגיש בהדרגה כל יום קצת יותר טוב. ואז זורקים אותך משם כי אתה מרגיש טוב מידי, אתה לוקח את הפנסיה שלך ומתחיל לעבוד. אחרי כמה שנים נותנים לך שעון מזהב. אחר כך אתה עובד ארבעים שנה ואתה צעיר מספיק להינות מהכסף. אתה מעשן, שותה אלכוהול, משתולל במסיבות, ואז אתה מוכן ללכת לבית ספר. אתה נעשה ילד, אתה משחק, אין לך חובות. אתה חוזר להיות תינוק עד אשר אתה נולד. ואז אתה מבלה את תשעת החדשים האחרונים של חייך צף בתוך קפה, עם חימום מרכזי ושירות חדרים, ואז-האלה-אתה מסיים את חייך בתור אורגאזמה. סיימתי את הקיש שלי". (וודי אלן).

Winnipeg WK hechsher put under OU auspices

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Vaad Ha'ir of Winnipeg has transferred the operation of its kashrut supervisory agency to the New York-based Orthodox Union, which administers the widely respected OU hechsher.

The OU, through its agent Rabbi Dovid Jenkins, who is based in New Jersey, will oversee a new Western Kosher (WK) hechsher and bring more than 120 current WK licensees into conformity with what the Vaad describes as the North America-wide standard of kashrut.

The OU supervises more than 6,000 plants in 77 countries, and its well-known hechsher can be found on more than 400,000 products.

For many decades, the Winnipeg Vaad Ha'ir oversaw the old Winnipeg Kosher certification – which was also known by the WK acronym – but it was not approved by the OU, and some people felt it didn't meet accepted North American standards. As a result, many Orthodox Jews in Winnipeg and outside the city didn't recognize the old WK hechsher.

More recently, in consultation with local rabbis, a concerted effort has been made to bring the more than 120 WK licensees into line with the standards of other major hechshers. Vaad officials say this has been accomplished with the transfer of kashrut supervision to the OU.

Vaad Ha'ir president Don Aronovitch said the Vaad is "delighted" with its new "partnership arrangement with the OU and Rabbi Jenkins," which he said is a result of "many months of careful deliberations and consultations with those committed to preserving kashrut" in Winnipeg.

He said that in searching for an appropriate partner to help shore up the WK hechsher, the Vaad tried to

- ensure that kosher supervision in Winnipeg would be retained, and even enhanced, and be readily available to any prospective licensee;
- ensure that all WK licensees would meet North American standards, thus ensuring the credibility of the WK hechsher throughout North America;
- provide continued employment for Vaad staff, and
- minimize the cost to the community.

Jonathan Kroft, president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, said that the "committee of rabbis and representatives of the Jewish community have put in countless hours to ensure a seamless continuance of the delivery of kosher food to our city. In the OU and Rabbi Jenkins, they found partners that will ensure that WK is a recognized label that meets the standards seen in cities across North America."

Rabbi Gabe Brojges will continue to serve as the WK's rabbinic administrator and Rick Stokoloff will continue as its general manager, the Vaad said.

As of Nov. 9, all kosher facilities in Winnipeg are under the new Western Kosher designation, with two exceptions: the Fort Garry Hotel in Winnipeg, which will remain under the supervision of Rabbi Avrohom Altein, the local Chabad Lubavitch rabbi, and Gunn's Bakery, which is certified as kosher by the Vaad Ha'ir but doesn't meet the "normative standards" accepted by the major kashrut organizations, the Vaad said.

"It is not clear to me right now whether Gunn's Bakery items will be able to have a WK hechsher on them, since Gunn's is not Western Kosher, so I don't know if they will be able to use the WK hechsher. They may not be able to. That will be up to Rabbi Jenkins to decide. He will be in town shortly," Stokoloff said.

He added that if Gunn's can't conform to the OU's kashrut standards, places such as the Fairmont Hotel, the Sharon Home for seniors and other licensees won't be able to serve Gunn's products.

Rabbi Jenkins will be working with Gunn's in the next few months to help it meet the OU standards. Until then, Gunn's will continue to be certified as kosher by the Vaad, but not the OU, the Vaad said.

Maxine Shuster, manager of Schmoozer's Deli, which is owned by the Asper Jewish Community Campus and is the only kosher restaurant in the city, said that "getting OU certification is a good thing. It means that anyone keeping any kashrut level will be able to eat at Shmoozer's. Any out-of-town rabbis or Orthodox Jews [in Winnipeg or visiting the city] will be able to eat here without concerns. This is good for the community."

Millie Kraus, owner of Elman's, a 70-year-old Winnipeg-based company that makes pickles and gourmet delicatessen foods said, "I see the OU certification as a good thing. We have started to ship our products out to eastern Canada. We have hopes to start shipping them out to the U.S. If you are a [North American-recognized] kosher company, this has a good bearing on Jews and non-Jews alike. It's a standard people are looking for in terms of quality of product and level of supervision."

The Vaad will soon be opening an information page at www.westernkosher.ca and said it welcomes questions about the new hechsher via e-mail at wkvaad@wkvaad.org, or phone at 204-487-9571.

Radio-Canada doc under fire

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Radio-Canada has acknowledged that a documentary it aired last month was "clearly pro-Palestinian" and says it will broadcast programs offering other viewpoints on Israel and Gaza in the future.

Geneviève Guay, director of complaints about information at the CBC's French-language network, was responding to a complaint by the pro-Israel media watchdog HonestReporting Canada about Radio-Canada's airing of Peace, Propaganda and the Promised Land: U.S. Media and the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict.

Guay acknowledged that the four-year-old film has only been partially updated since Israel's withdrawal from Gaza in 2005.

"Consequently, our introduction should have placed it in the context of 2004, rather than present it as reflecting the current challenges of the Middle East in the run-up to the 2008 U.S. presidential election," Guay said.

"It did indeed present a highly personal point of view on the conflict – one that we acknowledge was clearly pro-Palestinian. Rest assured that we have recently acquired other documentaries providing different perspectives on the situation in Israel and Gaza, which we plan to air in the coming months."

HonestReporting Canada executive director Mike Fegelman welcomed Guay's promise of additional documentaries and the acknowledgement that the film was introduced without proper context, but "we still felt that this wasn't sufficient, and we called on our 23,000 members to ask [Radio-Canada] ombudsman Julie Miville-Dechene to conduct a formal review of the matter to determine if the network's presentation of the film adhered to Radio-Canada standards of broadcasting and codes of ethics."

Fegelman wrote to HonestReporting's subscribers: "Airing a 'pro-Israel' documentary at a later date doesn't absolve the network for its original sin in airing a 'pro-Palestinian' propaganda film… By broadcasting this film, Radio-Canada abdicated its responsibility as a public broadcaster to do the necessary quality control checks, which should have ensured that this pro-Palestinian advocacy film was not aired in the first place."

The organization complained that Peace, Propaganda and the Promised Land was "rife with false premises, serious omissions, and unfounded malicious allegations," and that Radio-Canada had "breached its own journalistic standards and practices by airing a one-sided partisan polemic bent on vilifying a fellow democracy, the State of Israel."

It also objected to Radio-Canada host Simon Durivage's introduction, saying it "parroted the film's anti-Israel thesis."

The film compares the difference between the American media's coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and specifically Israel's settlement of Jews in the West Bank and Gaza, with that of other media in the world. It argues that the U.S. media are providing a distorted view of the situation in Israel's favour because of a conspiracy between Israel and powerful groups in the United States.

According to a description on the Media Education Foundation's website, the film "exposes how the foreign policy interests of American political elites – oil and a need to have a secure military base in the region, among others – work in combination with Israeli public relations strategies to exercise a powerful influence over how news from the region is reported."

The film specifically mentions HonestReporting's U.S. headquarters and another pro-Israel media watchdog, CAMERA, as having contributed to false perceptions of the conflict.

Fegelman said his group is not the only one that has concerns about Peace, Propaganda and the Promised Land. An analysis of the film by Yitzhak Santis, director of Middle East affairs for the Jewish Community Relations Council of San Francisco, concluded that public television stations should inform their audiences that the film is "not an objective study of media coverage of this conflict, but an advocacy piece with a political agenda."

In introducing the film, Durivage said in part: "According to Middle East experts, for 40 years, the settlement policy of the Hebrew state has grown inside the occupied Palestinian territories. The result: daily violence on both the Palestinian and Israeli side."

Fegelman points out that CBC's guidelines for "point-of-view documentaries in the sense of advocacy" state that the network should exercise caution in considering such films for broadcast, guarding against exploitation by political or economic interest groups, and, if they are aired, assure "fairness and balance by other means"

UJC General Assembly opens on festive note

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

JERUSALEM — More a festive celebration than a thoughtful presentation of ideas and policies, the opening of the General Assembly (GA) of the United Jewish Communities here on Sunday night was marked by the enthusiastic cheering and support of some 3,000 delegates from North America and Israel.

Any sense of sombre occasion suggested by the headlines in the Israeli media, which indicated that the global financial crisis would impinge upon and dominate the four-day gathering, was nowhere in evidence at the gala opening.

Songs and classical music featuring youthful performers were the entertainment fare offered to the large audience, which responded with occasionally raucous release.

He acknowledged his lame-duck prime ministerial status early in his remarks. "Although this is most likely my last appearance before this distinguished crowd as prime minister of Israel, this is by no means a goodbye," he said, without elaborating.

The outgoing prime minister cited the by now familiar list of "complex challenges" facing the Jewish state, at the top of which were "the peace process between Israel and its neighbours, the constant threat of terrorism, Iran's pursuit of nuclear weapons, the global financial crisis, socio-economic gaps in Israel and the education challenge."

Then, in acknowledgment of the fact that more than 800 delegates in the room were students, he called for the increased engagement of Jewish youth worldwide in communal life, adding that "there are also other, more silent, covert concerns, the dangers that we discover when it is almost, sometimes, too late – a weakening affinity of Jewish youth in the Diaspora to Israel is one such issue. The distancing of the future generations from the most basic principles of the Jewish faith is another such issue. And the gradual decrease in Jewish demographics is another such an issue."

The prime minister also reiterated the call for the free world to increase measures "to prevent Iran from achieving its devious goals."

The theme of the program was "a celebration of partnership" between the Diaspora and the State of Israel.

Secular candidate becomes Jerusalem's mayor

Incumbent returned in Tel Aviv

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Secular candidate Nir Barkat declared victory over his haredi rival Meir Porush in the Jerusalem mayoral election last Wednesday, in a race that again exposed the deep divide between religious and secular Israelis.

With all polling stations reporting in the capital, Barkat won 52 per cent of the vote, while Porush got 43 per cent. Russian billionaire Arcadi Gaydamak ran a distant third with just 3.6 per cent.

In his victory speech, Barkat declared himself the mayor of all Jerusalemites, pledging to work for those who had voted for him, as well as those who had voted for other candidates. He added that he would be working for both religious and secular, as well as Jewish and Arab residents of the city.

"I'm aware of the depth of the challenge and the complexity of the mission. Now is the time to work together for the good of the city," Barkat, a businessman and former paratroops officer, told his supporters.

The race in Jerusalem was one of many that captivated the country as Israelis around the country flocked to the polls for Tuesday's municipal elections, with Arab and haredi voter turnout exceeding expectations.

Meanwhile, in Tel Aviv, the incumbent mayor, Ron Huldai, won an additional five-year term in office. With all 646 precincts reporting, Huldai won 50 per cent of the vote, as opposed to the 34 per cent for left-wing Hadash Knesset member Dov Khenin. Challenger Oren Shachor placed third.

The victorious Huldai said he was "incredibly privileged to serve as the mayor of Tel Aviv during its centennial."

"The residents of Tel Aviv have made their choice," he added. "Democracy is our strong point. As I've said many times, I know Tel Aviv and its residents well. I'll continue to serve them, driven by my devotion to the city's development."

Huldai's campaign manager, Nissim Duek, said he was relieved. "We had to face an increasingly fashionable [rival] with very limited resources, contrary to what people might think. Almost all of our rivals ran very aggressive campaigns."

"Dov Khenin did a marvellous job," he added, "but they forgot that Tel Aviv is not just [the bohemian] Rothschild Boulevard."

Huldai's aides said that 150,000 of the city's residents, which comprise 37.5 percent of all of Tel Aviv's inhabitants, voted last Tuesday. Khenin's campaign staff expressed satisfaction at the turnout.

Khenin campaign officials said that the voter turnout was higher than in previous elections in 2003, yet, it was still lower than they would have liked.

Conceding defeat, Khenin said that he remains committed to municipal action.

"We had to deal with malicious allegations and spins, but insisted on running a decent campaign," he said. "The elections made me very optimistic. I got to know many people who are willing to do a lot to improve their situation."

In Be'er Sheva, the incumbent mayor, Ya'akov Terner, lost to his former deputy Rubik Danilovich. Terner won just 30 per cent of the vote, while Danilovich got 60 per cent.

When the polls closed, the nationwide voter turnout stood at 40 per cent. At least 36 per cent of those eligible to vote cast their ballots in Tel Aviv; 41 per cent voted in Jerusalem; Haifa saw a 35 per cent turnout; Be'er Sheva's voter turnout reached 40.7 percent; and in Kiryat Shmonah, which fielded nine candidates for mayor, the voter turnout stood at 33 per cent.

Arab and haredi voter turnout hovered around 30 per cent. In the southern town of Lakia, voter turnout reached 59 per cent.

General Assembly draws over 100 Canadians

Mark and Jane Wilf, the North American GA chairs, emphasized that younger Jews must be viewed as full members of the partnership.

Israeli GA chair Shari Arison urged the partnership to try to lead the world in finding solutions to pressing problems through the application of Jewish values.

The annual GA meeting brings together professional and lay leaders from 157 Jewish federations and 400 networked communities across North America

Delegates at the GA were to choose from a wide range of seminar and plenary discussions on Monday. On Tuesday, they were to head off by bus for site visits throughout the country to see firsthand how UJC funds are being put to work.

Usually held in North America, this year's assembly was originally planned as essentially a large celebration of Israel's 60th anniversary. Many commentators and writers pointed out that the gathering had been overshadowed, if not overtaken, by two events: the global economic and financial crisis, and the impending elections in Israel.

"The financial crisis has generated fears and profound uncertainty about the ability of the American Jewish federations… to continue to provide the desperately needed social services," wrote Jerusalem Post reporter Haviv Rettig.

"This was supposed to be a moving meeting between the two largest [Jewish groups] in the world," the GA's chief planner Nachman Shai, senior vice-president of UJC Israel told the Jerusalem Post. "In the end, it is clear the discussion will be dominated by the [economic] crisis."

But not all participants, at least on the first night of the GA, seemed too overwrought by the implications for the GA and for future UJC projects of the financial crisis.

Nelson Halpern, attending his sixth GA from Calgary, said he felt very good about the assembly. "They rushed Prime Minister Olmert out. He did not have much of an impact. After the anthems, it got to feel warm. The musicians were prodigies, all immigrants. It was incredible. They are our future, too."

Halpern said he planned to attend as many sessions as possible. He was especially proud of the 15-person delegation from Calgary, among the more than 100 who attended from Canada. "There is lots of support for Israel."

Arlene Greenberg of Montreal was attending her first GA, as a member of the delegation from Ottawa, where she was born. "It's amazing for me to see this many people dedicated to Israel," she enthused. "People come from so far away, from the States and Canada, and there is a common thread, a bond – the giving and the dedication."

Greenberg's sister, Janice, from Ottawa, found some of the organizational aspects confusing and irritating. Nevertheless, she was moved by the fact that there was a "special emphasis placed on the next generation."

Suspect works at Ottawa universities

Diab's name first surfaced in the cold case last year, when a French magistrate reopened it following word that German authorities had uncovered what they said is the group's old membership list.

Diab, a Lebanese-Canadian who works part-time as a professor in the University of Ottawa's department of sociology and anthropology, as well as at Carleton University, appeared in court last Friday for an extradition hearing.

The judge issued a publication ban and a court order sealing evidence in the case, and the hearing was adjourned until this week, Canadian Press reported.

Diab's lawyer, René Duval, who agreed to the ban, told CP that Diab was a victim of mistaken identity. He said Diab wasn't even in France at the time of the bombing and was likely still in Lebanon studying in university.

Two French judges issued an international arrest warrant against Diab earlier this month. Under Canadian law, French authorities have 45 days to add further evidence to support an extradition request.

L'Express said Diab had dual Lebanese and Canadian citizenship.

A team of French police, magistrates and intelligence officers are reportedly in Canada trying to arrange Diab's extradition to France.

In a statement, the French Jewish umbrella group, CRIF, praised the arrest, saying the attack was the first in France since World War II that "targeted Jews because they were Jews." CRIF thanked investigators for their 28 years of perseverance in the case.

B'nai Brith Canada called the international co-operation between French and Canadian authorities a strong model for fighting global terrorism.

"The relentless pursuit of justice by French authorities in this terrorist bombing spanned decades and crossed continents," Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith's executive vice-president, said in a statement. "It is precisely this kind of determined resolve to fight terrorism, backed by international partners, which should be emulated by all jurisdictions."

Qassam hit yard of Sderot home

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A Qassam rocket fired by Palestinian militants in the Gaza Strip struck a residential yard in the southern town of Sderot on Sunday, leaving one person with light shrapnel wounds. Several other people were treated for shock.

This was the third rocket to hit the Negev on Sunday, as violence between Israel and the coastal territory continued for a second week. Some 17 rockets and mortar shells hit southern Israel over the weekend, including four advanced Grad-type missiles.

Outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Sunday warned Gaza militants against further breaches of a five-month truce, speaking shortly after the Israel Air Force killed four gunmen who were firing mortars into Israel from the coastal territory.

"We will not tolerate the price tag that terrorist organizations are attempting to set. We will strike anyone who tries to violate the truce," Olmert told ministers at Sunday's cabinet meeting.

The prime minister said he'd told the Israel Defence Forces to present plans for various operations against Hamas' regime in Gaza, but gave no time frame.

"We are not eager for battle, but we do not fear it," Olmert said.

Israel Briefs

Label plan draws fire

Plans by Britain to label products from West Bank settlements are causing tensions with Israel. Ha'aretz reported that top Israeli officials have been urging Britain to cancel the plan, which they equate to a boycott, and that it was to be discussed when Foreign Minister David Miliband visits Israel this week. Britain says the plan meets a requirement of its trade agreements.

Interest rate cut

Bank of Israel governor Stanley Fischer cut the interest rate by 0.5 per cent to three per cent, the lowest in Israel's history. The global slowdown spurred the move.

Iran tests missile

Iran says it test-fired a new surface-to-surface missile with a range of 1,900 kilometres, which puts Israel in its reach. In announcing the test, state-run media said Iran is ready to defend itself against any attack.

Hamas gunmen killed

Israeli soldiers killed four Hamas gunmen Nov. 12 near the Gaza border fence. The men were trying to enter Israel and plant explosives in the area around Khan Younis, near the Kissufim crossing. Rifles and grenades were found on their bodies. An Israeli soldier was wounded in the exchange, in which the soldiers pursued the gunmen into Gaza. The Palestinians later fired mortar shells at the crossing.

Army sanctions soldiers

The Israeli army said last week it will court-martial four soldiers filmed taunting a bound and blindfolded Palestinian. The video of the incident, which reportedly took place a year ago, was posted last week on YouTube and drew global attention.

Dancing her way through adversity

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Natalli Reznik [CTV photos]

Canadian reality TV viewers are basking in the glow of CTV's newest reality show, So You Think You Can Dance Canada.

Now just past the halfway point in its inaugural season, the show's field of dancers has been whittled down to eight competitors from the initial 20, one of whom is Israeli-Canadian Natalli Reznik.

It seems the viewing audience is smitten with this dancer from the Holy Land, as they keep voting her back week after week.

Reznik moved to Toronto with her parents at 14 after growing up in a suburb of Haifa.

A fluid dancer, she has successfully shaken and shimmied her way up the show's talent ladder and tonight is poised to move on to the top six and possibly become "Canada's First Favourite Dancer", as the show titles its pending champion.

If she wins, Reznik will receive $100,000 and a Mercedes-Benz car.

Now 29, she admits to being a relatively late bloomer to the world of dancing, having only begun formal training at age 17.

In a phone interview with The CJN/Heebonics earlier this month from the set of the show, she noted how a difficult transition from Israel to Canada helped forge her determination to dance and succeed in life, despite all odds.

"It was a rough time in my life," she said of her adolescence. "I moved to Canada, my parents divorced and I moved out on my own at 18. I wasn't at home with a mom and dad who were always there. I was by myself and had to always push and work hard. And there were other things that I won't get into. But all I could think about was dancing. It was my whole world."

Reznik said that even before the move she used to dance and make up routines with friends and classmates after school in Israel for the sheer joy of it.

After working her way into small roles and bit parts in TV and movies over the last decade, Reznik eventually found herself dancing at age 25 for the Cirque du Soleil's Love show in Las Vegas. She called that her "big break." Her next gig was as a backup dancer for singer Nelly Furtado on her world tour in 2007.

She said that while working with Cirque was a great experience, it wasn't what she wanted to do with her dance and that it was only when she got her job with Furtado that she started to "really enjoy" her professional life again.

"One of the [Cirque's] choreographers said he loved the energy, authenticity and honesty in my dance," Reznik recalled. "With Nelly, I got more into hip-hop and Latin styles, which, at this point in my life, suit me more. But I'm pretty open to different styles."

This summer, Reznik decided to take a chance and audition with thousands of others for So You Think You Can Dance Canada and was floored when she was chosen as one of the show's 20 contestants after two weeks of tryouts.

"I was shocked when I got in," she said. "It's a challenge."

While she's having a tremendous time showcasing her talent on live TV every week, when pressed, she admitted that she's not comfortable with the spotlight outside of the show's confines.

"I don't usually like to perform in front of family and friends," Reznik said shyly. "I'm getting great support, but whenever someone talks about me on the show, I say 'OK. Great. Can we talk about something else?'"

When asked if she intends to surprise the show's judges and the voting audience with any Israeli folk-dance moves, Reznik giggled and said, "No, I don't think so."

Still, she calls Israel her "home" and continues to visit friends and family there each year.

Reznik said she's "always changing her style" and that the show's judges keep telling her they like her versatility and maturity.

Having said that, Reznik admits that her passion for dance evolved through the years.

"At 19, 20, 21... I lived and breathed dance. It was everything. I had to be a dancer, to prove to myself I could do it," she said. "But it was tough because from 17 to 25 nothing was working out. But then I left the [formal] dance scene, stopped going to classes and started doing my own stuff and understanding what suits me, that's when things worked out for me."

Her success on So You Think You Can Dance Canada notwithstanding, Reznik said she's looking forward to moving on and trying her hand in feature film or theatre using her knowledge as a dancer.

"I've had some small roles in films where I dance, but I think it would be great to help a choreographer get into more visual [sequences] and be more of an art director," she said, adding, "But I'm not sure. I want to keep Toronto as my home base, but I'm also thinking of moving out to Los Angeles. I don't know. Things can change, and I don't usually think that far ahead."

Reznik said if she wins So You Think You Can Dance Canada, "it would be crazy" and it would open "a lot of doors" for her. More importantly, she said she'd subsequently donate a lot of her prize money and time to worthy causes.

"When I was growing up, it was really tough for me in certain [academic] areas. Things didn't come easy for me," she said. "I'd love to go to different dance schools and tell kids that even though it's tough out there, you can make it and your time will come. And dance from your heart, be strong and don't give up. Because if I could make it, so can you.

"If I can help kids this way, my heart would be pleased and I'd feel more fulfilled. If someone could have given me this advice when I was younger, I would have appreciated it."

Jazz pianist aims for bestseller with new CD

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Ron Davis will perform songs from his new album The Bestseller.

Jazz pianist and composer Ron Davis has recorded his sixth CD, a piano/clarinet duo with clarinettist Sasha Boychouk called The Bestseller.

Davis is having a release party for The Bestseller at 8:30 p.m at Hugh's Room in Toronto on Nov. 20.

The show's two sets will include songs from The Bestseller with Boychouk and some solo piano. Bassist Jordon O'Connor and drummer Sly Juhas will join Davis and Boychouk.

"Clarinet used to be the 'king of jazz' instrument – in fact the greatest players were Jewish men – Artie Shaw and Benny Goodman – and then, for some reason, it disappeared from jazz," says Davis, a Toronto native. "To bring a piano/clarinet album into the jazz world makes it inherently unique."

David adds that the songs on his new CD are mostly original. "My songs are not typical jazz songs, not classical and they're not pop... but they are influenced by all those."

The 12 tracks and nine interludes on the CD include a mix of songs – a piece by Brahms; Lush Life by Billy Strayhorn; Mahna Mahna, by the Muppets; and a great Jewish tune called Dror Yikrah.

Although not observant, he says he is thoroughly Jewish in every way he thinks and plays, so it is natural for him to express that by playing a Jewish song. On his fourth CD, Shimmering Rhythm, Davis had his father sing a Passover song.

Davis, 51, is a graduate of Associated Hebrew School and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (now the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto). Davis was also a member of the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation choir.

"Immediately after this concert [at Hugh's Room], I am going to begin preparations on a very exciting project with symphony orchestras plus me, of my original songs," he says.

"It will be premièring in February 2009 with the Windsor Symphony Orchestra. I plan to take these symphony concerts across the country and eventually around the world. Then, I plan to record it later in 2009."

At the end of November, Davis will have a new video from his last CD, Subarashii Live, on his website (www.rondavismusic.com). Directed by Karen Shopsowitz, the video is called Whirlycurl.

Davis, who once worked as a lawyer and an assistant professor in the French department at University of Toronto, is married to Daniela Nardi, a jazz and world-pop influenced singer, songwriter, pianist and producer. Nardi just released her second CD, The Rose Tattoo, dedicated to the memory of her mother, who died recently. Davis and Nardi have started to collaborate on a CD of Jewish and Italian songs reflecting his religion and her ancestry.

"The Jewish people and Italian people have so much in common. Daniela fits right in with my family and I fit right in with her family – sometimes you can't tell the difference," Davis says.

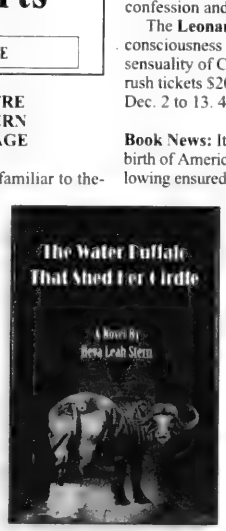
FORMER TORONTO THEATRE DIRECTOR REVA LEAH STERN MOVES FROM STAGE TO PAGE

The name Reva Leah Stern will still be familiar to theatregoers who attended productions at the Leah Posluns Theatre for the 19 years that she was its artistic director. Stern has remained busy since leaving Toronto some two decades ago, working as the regional casting director for the American Academy of Dramatic Arts for New York and Los Angeles for much of that time. Her first novel, The Water Buffalo That Shed Her Girdle, was recently published.



The story focuses on career woman Rachel Morganstein as she probes her past and family relations for a clue as to why her 23-year-old son, Aaron, has not invited her to his upcoming wedding. The book was published by Bookland Press of Toronto. www.booklandpress.com

Sylvia & Lennie: Young Centre for the Performing Arts presents the One Yellow Rabbit Performance Theatre's productions of Sylvia Plath Must Not Die and Doing Leonard Cohen. The first focuses on poets Plath and Anne Sexton, whose "insatiable appetites, sexual and intellectual, sparked a revolution in American poetry." The play is described as "a voyeuristic journey to an era of cocktails, confession and catharsis."

The Leonard Cohen piece is "a hallucinatory, stream-of-consciousness homage [that] boldly re-imagines the complex sensuality of Canada's fiercest poetic voice." Each play $30; rush tickets $20, youth rush $5. Distillery District, 55 Mill St. Dec. 2 to 13. 416-866-8666. www.youngcentre.ca

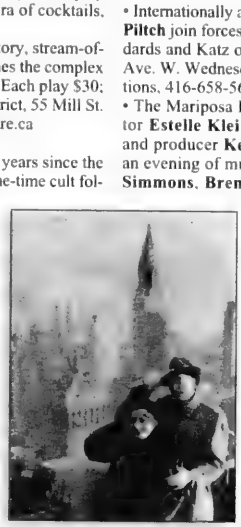
Book News: It's been slightly more than 100 years since the birth of American author Ayn Rand, whose one-time cult following ensured steady sales of her 1943 novel, The Fountainhead, which has sold more than five million copies to date. Marking the anniversary, American publishers Signet and Plume have reissued several of Rand's works in softcover centennial editions.



Rand with husband in 1947

Plume's new pressing of The Fountainhead contains an afterword by former Winnipegger Leonard Peikoff, an early Rand acolyte and devotee of her philosophy of objectivism. Signet has also brought out Ayn Rand: Three Plays and The Early Ayn Rand, a selection from her unpublished fiction edited and introduced by Peikoff.

"I first met Ayn Rand in 1951 at her home in California," writes Peikoff, founder of the Ayn Rand Institute. "She was writing Atlas Shrugged at the time; I was a pre-medical student who loved The Fountainhead and was brimming over with philosophical questions to ask her about it. That meeting changed my life."

Like many socialist and communist Jews of her era, Rand was fervently secular and rejected all religion as superstition. "Randian Man, like Marxian Man, is made the centre of a godless world," reviewer Whittaker Chambers once observed in the National Review. Despite her philosophical rigidity, there's a wonderful momentum and energy in her prose, and she's a brilliant propagandist. I am enjoying rereading The Fountainhead, a huge novel that I first consumed along with Atlas Shrugged in high school.

Author David Bezmozgis writes and directs movie about Russian Jewish community

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

David Bezmozgis, celebrated author of the prize-winning book Natasha and Other Stories, was on skates on the ice in North York Centennial Arena recently, along with a camera crew and a group of teenaged actors in skates and hockey uniforms.

All were involved in filming a scene from Victoria Day, a feature film that Bezmozgis wrote and is now directing in association with the Toronto-based production company Markham Street Films.

"I played hockey at Centennial where we are right now," Bezmozgis said during a lunch break to explain his facility on ice. His facility as a film director may be explained by his training at the University of Southern California School of Cinema-Television and his previous experience directing one feature and two short films.

His last directorial experience was in 2003 when he created The Genuine Article, a documentary on the recruitment of articling students that appeared on CBC's The National. Since then, he's concentrated on writing prose fiction, including Natasha And Other Stories, which earned many prestigious awards and notices, including the City of Toronto Book Award and inclusion on the Los Angeles Times' 25 best books of the year listing for 2004. Since Natasha's brilliant reception, Bezmozgis has been at work on a novel.

David Bezmozgis

The 35-year-old Latvian-born writer, who settled in Toronto with his parents in 1980, wrote Victoria Day about eight years ago. It's a coming-of-age tale in the life of Ben Spektor, the teenaged son of Russian-Jewish immigrants in Toronto. Ben lends some money to a fellow hockey player, who promptly disappears, after which Ben begins a romance with his sister.

"Our hero has always had a crush on this boy's sister and he's never been able to pursue her because of the brother," Bezmozgis said. "But now that the brother is strangely out of the picture, the romance develops. It takes place over a period of about five days while this kid is missing."

Like the stories in Natasha, the tale conveyed in Victoria Day contains emblematic aspects of Bezmozgis' own teenage years in Jewish North Toronto of the 1980s. But unlike the stories in Natasha, the tale in Victoria Day is less dependent on finely wrought prose and had a realistic and visual quality, Bezmozgis immediately sensed, more appropriate for the screen.

Just as he seems comfortable on skates, Bezmozgis said he feels at home in the medium of film, even as a crew of cinematographers, production assistants, gaffers and other assorted technicians throng around him.

How does making a film compare with writing prose? "It's a far more collaborative medium," he said. "But in some senses the film is better because I'm not the only guiding creative light. There are people here – the cinematographer, the art director, the sound guy – who know those facets of film work better than I do. And it's a question of finding the right people who know your sensibility and working together, and often times elevating what you do. That's been my experience on this film.

"As a writer, you spend your time sitting by yourself with very little contact with other people. As a film director it's completely the opposite. There are people around all the time, and it's your responsibility to communicate with them to see that we capture what we're all trying to capture."

Some of the settings in Victoria Day will seem familiar to the Jewish community because many scenes were shot in the Finch-Bathurst area and the neighbourhood of Bathurst Manor. "Among other things, the film will present a record of Canadian Jewish life and Russian Jewish immigrant life."

Gemini-nominated actor Mark Rendall plays the lead role, which, like most parts in the script, required an ability to speak Russian fluently. All of the actors are Russians who were basically chosen to play characters much like themselves.

"The film works because of the wonderful actors who portray experiences very close to who they are," Bezmozgis said. "You don't have some American actor coming in and trying to put on a Russian accent. The goal here, as in all my work, is to capture what life is really like."

Since filming concluded, Bezmozgis has been cloistered away in post-production with the goal of having the film ready for the Sundance Institute Lab in January. If that deadline is too tight, the release date will be later in 2009.

Kaeja d'Dance celebrates its chai anniversary

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The Kaeja d'Dance, a contemporary dance company known internationally for its innovative physically demanding choreography and acclaimed dance films, is now in its 18th year.

Co-founders and co-artistic director Allen and Karen Kaeja, who have performed on stages across North America and Europe and in Asia, are inviting people to celebrate their chai anniversary at this year's Kaeja Lounge, their annual fundraiser.

The festivities take place on Nov. 26, 7:30 to 9:30 p.m. at the Edward Day Gallery at 952 Queen St. W., Suite 200.

The Kaejas, who have two daughters Aniya, 15, and Mika, 10, established Kaeja d'Dance in 1990, to showcase their particular style of dance and choreography.

The company's mandate has since grown, to include films about dance and education. Karen Kaeja says that the films are funded by organizations such as Bravo and their educational work is done in partnership with the Toronto District School Board and Harbourfront Centre.

The couple describe the lounge event as a party that will include footage from their Dead Sea performance, live presentations by 18 dancers and some hands-on exposure to the innovative modern dance elements that Kaeja dance company is known for.

The footage from the Dead Sea stems from the couple's work in Israel two years ago, when they gave presentations of dance on film at the Tel Aviv Film Festival and at Yad Vashem. "We developed a dance film series on the Holocaust. We started in 1997, and over a decade we created seven films," says Allen Kaeja.

"We were told that we were the first choreographers creating the first dance films loosely based on the Holocaust."

He says the films, which include depictions of ghetto life and resistance fighters, are inspired by the experiences of his late father, Morten Norris, who was interned at Auschwitz.

The live performances at the lounge will include an excerpt from Wedding Threads, created by Karen for the 2008 Dusk Dances.

Guests can opt to be filmed at a video dance booth, where they will be guided to express themselves, Karen says. "They'll be given ideas to move to. It will be part of a video that will be screened at the end of the evening."

She says there will also be a Kaeja elevation booth, where people can experience the dance lifts the couple have developed. "We're known for these lifts. We teach them all over the world.

"Allen or I will be taking guests into a modified lift."

And yes, petite, fine-boned Karen can do heavy lifting. She points to a picture of herself lifting her husband, a tall, muscular man who started out as a wrestler.

Indeed his foray into dance was pure happenstance. A native of Kitchener-Waterloo, Allen was training for the varsity wrestling team at Waterloo University. He took his first dance class at the age of 20 to improve his balance. "Once I started dance class, I realized that was it."

He says he was wowed by the possibilities of choreography, adding that his energetic and physical style is sometimes compared to the athletic style of the late Hollywood dance legend Gene Kelly.

Allen says he was quite smitten with his wife when they first met as performers in the same dance troupe, but it took several years until they finally got together.

"He chased me for four years," Karen says, laughing. "When I met him, I fell in love with partnering and th potential of what we could ignit through partnering."

A late bloomer, the Toronto born Karen Resnick took her fir dance lesson the summer before sh auditioned for the dance program at Yor University. She also studied psycholog and initially was a reluctant performer.

She was much more interested in danc therapy. In fact, she started the dance therap program at Baycrest in 1981, when she was a undergraduate student.

Her teachers recognized her talent an steered her toward the stage, she recalls. "M professors kept giving me scholarships for pe formance study."

As for the name Kaeja, it was fashione from the initials of both their given names, say Allen, explaining that he had no attachment t the name Norris, the surname his father assume in Canada. "The name Norris [is] empty becaus it was a made-up name. It was randomly cho sen."

For more information about the Kaej Lounge, call 416-516-6030 or e-mail kaeja@ kaeja.org.

Play pays tribute to Survivors and Israeli statehood

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In recognition of Israel's 60th anniversary, the Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre is currently presenting a play that pays tribute to its rebirth and the Holocaust survivors who fought for it.

A Glimpse of the Light, a musical romance written by Ben Finn and directed and produced by Ari Weisberg, will run at the Leah Posluns Theatre until Nov. 23.

It unfolds on a nearly bare stage, relating the story of a group of nine Holocaust survivors who make their way to Palestine in the face of a British naval blockade and begin their lives anew on a kibbutz besieged by Arabs.

As the title suggests, A Glimpse of the Light is upbeat in tone, even as darkness descends or threatens to do so.

The survivors, their suitcases in tow, board a ship captained by Jack Levine (Barrett Morrison), an open-hearted American Jew.

"Forget your lost world," says a member of the crew in a reference to their former homes in eastern European shtetls. "You'll love Palestine."

The passengers do not need much encouragement. "We're heading to where we want to be," they sing in unison. Judging by this line, the survivors have few doubts. There is no going back to Europe, and Palestine beckons.

As the ship heads toward the Middle East, the characters reveal themselves in a flurry of words and in bursts of lilting songs.

Shmuelik (Clinton Somerton), a cock sabra and crew member, dismisses the Diaspo ra with a wave of the hand, relegating it to th annals of "ancient history." Once in Palestin he argues that only Jews have a right to Jude and Samaria and that Arabs should move t Trans-Jordan.

Yudel (Jack Ossof), a grizzled survivo fond of reciting pearls of Jewish wisdom a handed down to him by his sage father, dis agrees, saying that the land should be share in a spirit of coexistence.

The theme of romantic love manifest itself early on, when, in a flashback in Nazi occupied Poland, Ruchel (Nala Burdyna) an Moishe (Marc Richter), pledge themselves t each other. But once Ruchel has boarded th ship without her beloved Moishe, Jack take a shine to her.

In Part 2, the survivors adapt themselve to new routines on Kibbutz Yad Mordecha and learn that armed conflict with their Ara neighbours is inevitable and imminent.

Avram (Martin Edmonds), a kibbutz leade assures them that they will prevail. "We' make it through," he says without a tremor doubt in his voice.

This sort of untrammelled optimism su fuses A Glimpse of the Light from beginnin to end.

Ably directed by Weisberg, and dis tinguished by fine performances, the pla honours the resilience of the survivors in the new, embattled homeland.

Books & Authors

Three books for Toronto lovers

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

If you're a Toronto lover like me, you're bound to enjoy and marvel over Michael Redhill's novel Consolation (Anchor Canada, paperback), which delivers a gripping human story, elegantly and poetically told, along with a grittily realistic literary portrait of 1850s Toronto that is so well executed that it shines.

In alternating chapters, Consolation artfully knits together two separate views of Toronto in two different time frames – the city of today and the city of 150 years ago – without a hint of artifice. The novel moves contrapuntally between two dramatic stories with characters that, like those in John Fowles' The French Lieutenant's Woman, seem to have unseen points of correspondence with one another across the gulf of time.

In the contemporary story, an urban archeologist discovers clues that lead him to believe a priceless cache of 1850s glass-plate photographs of Toronto may be retrieved from the harbour, where they sank in a fierce storm. The alternate story tells of a newly arrived British immigrant who, after the failure of his chemist's shop, learns the art of photography from a dying colleague and begins capturing the rough-edged city as it emerges from the mud and miasmal bogs – creating those very photographs.

After the archeologist dies, his wife, daughter and daughter's partner pursue his dream of retrieving the glass plates from an area of the former lake that has been topped up with landfill. A central locale in the story is a room in a lakefront hotel tower that overlooks an excavation where backhoes are feverishly uncovering the city's forgotten past – an incidental part of digging the foundation for yet another modern tower.

The human relationships at the core of both halves of Consolation are real, complex and evolving. Much more than a treasure-quest unfolds in these pages. The book is equally about the characters' inner lives and the exploration of new modes of living and loving after more traditional models fail.

Consolation bears affinities to Michael Ondaatje's In The Skin of the Lion, which also fills its canvas with icons of old Toronto, and The English Patient, which also throws together a group of unlikely people as roommates with startling results. The book likewise bears comparison to Margaret Atwood's Alias Grace, which conveyed a tale of 1840s Toronto with equal luminescence and, yes, grace.

Along with writers such as Anne Michaels, Howard Ackler and Ondaatje himself, Redhill is of the Ondaatje school of novel-writing. The prose is usually intensely poetic, relationships are always complex and dynamic, and the world is shown to be a place of infinite interwoven mystery. The narrative proceeds by way of revelations and removal of one obscuring skin after another. A New Yorker reviewer once said of Ondaatje's writing that "it is so finely wrought as to be unreadable," but Consolation is neither precious nor obscure: it is forthright and masterful as it attains a breathtaking level of realism and authenticity. With this book – his best so far – Redhill goes to the top of the class.

"If Consolation provokes Torontonians to look deeper at this place, if it causes their gaze to linger longer, then I'll feel the book has burst its covers and gone out in the world to live in its readers. There's nothing else a writer could ask for," Redhill wrote in an online blog earlier this year.

Even after Consolation won last year's City of Toronto book award, I delayed reading it for personal reasons. For years I've been attempting to write a novel set in 19th-century Toronto and didn't want to be unduly influenced. Well, too late now. It's a book that will stay with me.

Plucked from the ether, Consolation's masterful portrait of mid-19th-century Toronto has emerged as magically as the sudden appearance of an image on a darkroom photographic plate. Kudos to the author for doing his homework so thoroughly and then applying his scholarship so invisibly in the service of this well-formed and gripping tale.

Derek Hayes' Historical Atlas of Toronto, a recent hardcover offering from Douglas & McIntyre, presents a different sort of love affair with the city of Toronto as it revives the city's past through stunning full-colour maps, rare historical documents and rich stories.

The cover shows a stunningly detailed bird's-eye view of the city of 1884, with a harbour full of steamers and sailing ships, and a cityscape bejewelled with many Victorian-era architectural gems since lost. (See William Dendy's Lost Toronto for an inventory.) That Victorian map is also reproduced within, one of many that you can easily pore over for half an hour or more.

Colourful maps of historic Fort York, the Canadian National Exhibition and "new" suburban areas such as Rosedale, West Toronto Junction and Lawrence Park Estates, to name but a few, are supplemented with insightful notes and archival illustrations of buildings, people and streets. One delightfully illustrated map from the subway's opening in 1955 offers a rare Jewish reference by pinpointing the location of Beth Tzedec Congregation on McCaul Street, just months before the inauguration of the new building on north Bathurst Street.

Those with an appreciation for the city's history and growth will enjoy perusing this thorough and well-produced book.

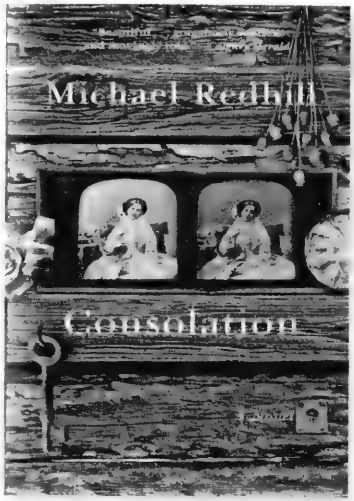
Offered in conjunction with a current museum exhibition of the same name at the Royal Ontario Museum, Mark Osbaldeston's newly published Unbuilt Toronto: A History of the City That Might Have Been offers a compilation of building projects and schemes that – in many cases, thankfully – never saw the light of day. (Case in point: the Spadina Expressway, mercifully stopped at Eglinton.)



An unbuilt island tunnel, an unbuilt Queen Street subway, an unbuilt tower atop the former Eaton's at College Park – these are among the dozens of unrealized architectural dreams revisited here.

In one 1945 scheme, Toronto's modern city hall would have resembled one of those receding 1930s-style skyscrapers common in Buffalo and would have faced west toward Osgoode Hall and turned its back on Old City Hall.

This collection of "might have been" visions of Toronto reminds me of writer Robert Fulford's apt phrase "accidental city" in describing the present urban reality. Unbuilt Toronto, the book, is published by the Dundurn Press; the exhibition remains on view until Jan. 11.

Coast to Coast

Most Canadians want to learn more about Shoah

The main category – overall knowledge of the Holocaust – revealed that within the seven per cent of all Canadians who had never heard of it, one in eight was between 18 and 24.

Better news, Jedwab said, was that about two out of every three Canadians reported having some level of "good knowledge" about the Holocaust.

In terms of level of education, more than 23 per cent of Canadians with only an elementary school education said they had never heard of the Holocaust, compared with 1.7 per cent of those with a master's degree.

The survey also showed that Canadians who know about the Holocaust learned about it in a variety of ways. Thirty-six per cent have read a book, and 13 per cent have seen Holocaust exhibits in museums. More than half read about the subject in a newspaper or saw a film about it, while 60 per cent of Canadians age 18 to 24 learned about the Holocaust in school. Half of Canadians with Holocaust knowledge have talked with parents or friends about it.

Jedwab also noted that contact with Jews boosts the odds of people having more Holocaust knowledge. Two-thirds of people with frequent contact with Jews claim good knowledge of the Holocaust, as do 60 per cent with only occasional contact. Only one-quarter of people who have never met anyone Jewish reported having good knowledge of the Holocaust.

How do Canadians feel about learning more about the Holocaust? According to the survey, 55 per cent said they would like to learn more, and 75 per cent said the subject should be mandatory in school. Seventy-seven per cent also felt that teaching about racism and anti-Semitism should be more of a priority, and 45 per cent would consider attending a Holocaust memorial ceremony.

One "paradoxical" finding, Jedwab noted, was that 30 per cent of Canadians with "good knowledge" of the Holocaust also agreed with the idea that "we are too frequently reminded about the Holocaust today."

The survey also asked Canadians about their attitudes toward Holocaust denial and Nazi war criminals. Seventy-two per cent agreed that Nazi war criminals should be brought to justice, but less than half – 48 per cent – thought denying the Holocaust should be a crime.

Jedwab said the survey also revealed that the more knowledge Canadians had about the Holocaust, the more aware they were about the general issue of genocide and the stronger their conviction that more could be done to prevent it. More than 90 per cent of Canadians with "good knowledge" of the Holocaust were also aware of current genocides.

On the other hand, in the historical context, the survey results suggested that while greater Holocaust knowledge is correlated to better knowledge of historic anti-Semitism, many Canadians are simply "not aware" of what happened in the past, Jedwab said.

According to the survey, fifty-four per cent believe that Canada welcomed the arrival of Jews during World War II – contrary to Canada's actual "none-is-too-many legacy" – and only one-third believe that Canada "did not do enough" to prevent the Holocaust.

More than one-quarter said they didn't know if Canada didn't do enough, underscoring, Jedwab said, the need for improved programs in schools and elsewhere. The survey also indicated a predictable correlation between the level of Holocaust knowledge and the belief that Canada could have done more.

On the issue of diversity, the survey also found correlations between greater Holocaust knowledge and education and attitudes towards diversity. The greater the Holocaust knowledge, the more Canadians expressed "somewhat" less concern over non-Christian immigration, the belief that society was strengthened by diversity and "somewhat" more support for more effort to accommodate differences.

The survey reported that 59 per cent of Canadians agree "that society should try harder to accept the customs and traditions of minority religious groups."

At the press conference, Louise Sultan, associate co-ordinator for Fighting Anti-Semitism Together (FAST), a coalition of non-Jewish community and business leaders founded by Elizabeth and Tony Comper, said one of the challenges of her work is to get people to "make the connection" between Holocaust knowledge and the appreciation of diversity.

"We want to make that connection," she said.

Two Jewish skaters crack Calgary Flames lineup

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — For those young men aspiring to one day scratch their way to the pinnacle of pro hockey, the National Hockey League, you have to have more than a little mazel – luck.

Obviously, you have to have been blessed with talent, but survival instincts, mental and physical toughness, healthy living habits and a positive attitude are the kinds of prime assets that also ought to be stuffed into your equipment bag.

At this point, training camp auditions are over and thousands of hockey hopefuls have scattered across North America and Europe seeking their fortunes on golden ponds. The fortunate will receive a hearty mazel tov and the others, a broken heart.

Mike Cammalleri, only 5-9 and 180 pounds, is the son of a Jewish mother, Adele Gelbard, and a father of Sicilian origin. The slick skater toiled last season for the Los Angeles Kings and is now a Calgary Flame, following a June 20th draft-day swap for a first-round (17th overall) pick.

The Richmond Hill, Ont., native scored 19 goals last season and added 28 assists in 63 games. The left-winger was brought to Alberta to beef up the Flames offence, but his plus-minus numbers were a team-high minus-16. That negative stat indicated he failed to back-check efficiently, thereby affording the opposition abundant scoring opportunities.

Nonetheless, Cammalleri, a second-round pick in the 2001 entry draft, has excellent playmaking skills, very good anticipation, plus a nose for the net. The 26-year-old honed his skills playing junior hockey in Bramalea, Ont., and with the Michigan Wolverines at the college level. He was a member of the 2007 gold medal Canadian team at the IIHF World Championship.

(According to Sean Kelso, manager of media relations for the Flames, Cammalleri told him he wasn't raised Jewish, but rather in a non-denominational home. His mother is, however, Jewish.)

Meanwhile, the proverbial wandering Jew is on the move again. Veteran defenceman Mathieu Schneider, 39, who played his 1,200th NHL game earlier this fall, was traded from Anaheim to the Atlanta Thrashers – not because he wasn't performing well with the Ducks, but he commands an annual paycheque of $5,575,000, which put Anaheim over the salary cap.

A prolific scoring rearguard, he has career totals of 212 goals and 491 assists. Only 5-10 and 195 pounds, Schneider, a third-round selection of Montreal back in 1987, has a great shot from the point and is invaluable on the power play, besides being an excellent lateral skater.

The trade winds also blew late last season for centre Jeff Halpern, 32, and, oddly, he ended up participating in 83 games in an 82-game schedule.

Originally signed as a free agent in 1999 by the Washington Capitals, the six-foot, 200-pound centre is described as being more of a checker than a scorer. Yet in 2007-08, the native of Potomac, Md. who excels on the penalty-kill unit, first scored 10 goals and added 14 assists with the Dallas Stars. Then in only 19 games, he went on a scoring spree with his new club, the Tampa Bay Lightning, contributing 10 more markers and eight helpers for a career best season of 20 goals and 22 assists.

Tampa Bay, unfortunately, will be without the diligent worker with leadership qualities until at least January. The unlucky Jewish skater, whose mom Gloria, 56, was killed in a fiery car crash almost four years ago, suffered a ruptured anterior cruciate ligament at the IIHF World Hockey Championship in May. The U.S. team captain also suffered a sprain to his medial collateral ligament and a small tear to his lateral meniscus.

Eric Nystrom

Much was expected of the Calgary Flames' Eric Nystrom, 25, a hard-hitting left-winger – first, because he is the son of Bob Nystrom, a member of the U.S. National Jewish Sports Hall of Fame who enjoyed an outstanding playing career with the New York Islanders and, second, because the Syosset, N.Y. native was picked in the first round, 10th overall, by Calgary in 2002.

Last year, the 6-1, 200-pounder, a former captain of the Michigan Wolverines, played 44 games and registered three goals and four assists. Injuries have hampered Nystrom, who plays a sound up-and-down game like his dad did, and management hopes he has even more untapped potential as a power forward.

Many others kids of Jewish background are on the cusp and are no doubt dreaming that this will be their breakthrough year.

Winnipeg's Jacob Micflikier, 24, started the season with the East Coast Hockey League (ECHL) Florida Everblades. On Oct. 23, after a strong camp, the forward was called up by the AHL Rochester Americans.

Toronto-born goaltender Robert Gherson, 25, a 2002 draft pick of the Washington Capitals, was the backup for the AHL champion Chicago Wolves last season. The former Sarnia Sting junior is back for another season in the windy city. Last season, he was 8-6 with a goals against average of 2.61 and a save percentage of .914.

Colby Cohen, drafted in the second round last June by the Colorado Avalanche, is back with Boston University's NCAA team. The 6-2 defenceman had three goals and 13 assists last year.

Forward Oren Eizenman, 23, recently signed a pro tryout contract with the Manitoba Moose of the AHL. The Toronto native scored 27 goals and had 39 assists last season with the ECHL's Fresno Falcons.

Adam, a 2002 second-round pick by Tampa Bay, who played junior with the Brampton Battalion, is skating with the AHL Wilkes-Barre/Scranton Penguins. Last year, the 24-year-old played in the league with the Norfolk Admirals, where in 43 games he scored 14 goals and added 17 assists. The 6-4, 225-pound skater also played a dozen games with the Wheeling Nailers of the ECHL and recorded 10 goals and 10 assists.

Michael, 28, a first-round pick by the Oilers in 1998, 13th overall, is playing in Europe for the second straight season with Wolfsburg Grizzly Adams of the Deutsche Elite League.

Cowardly hiding behind anonymity

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

One of the few things that bugs me about Web 2.0 is the curtain of anonymity that it affords critics, cynics and just plain mean-spirited folk who populate blogs and news sites. Hiding behind user-generated nicknames that effectively conceal their identity, these people spread hatred, racism and bald-faced lies – and they do so without fear of being reprimanded. Even a website as benign as YouTube often becomes a base for hateful bigots, who use the comment sections of individual videos to spout off.

New Views

It need not be like this. Politicians, newsmakers, pop stars, journalists – they all put their names on the line each time they offer an opinion or state an item as fact. That element of risk is important. It acts as a built-in verification system. When your name and career are on the line, you are less likely to say or write something that is wrong or could get you in trouble. Internet misfits, seemingly, are not weighed down by such worries.

Back in late September – Yom Kippur, to be exact – a pamphlet was distributed at many Toronto synagogues. Its bold headline, "Strengthening our bond with Israel," bore a striking resemblance to the flyers sent to synagogues by Israel Bonds, usually at the same time of the year.

But this was no Israel Bonds advert.

Quite the opposite. "Israel Bonds have always symbolized the aspirations of the Jewish people," the pamphlet began. "Sadly, this is no longer the case." Why? Because the Israeli government has "betrayed" the Jewish people and "is not interested in the future of the people of Israel and the Jewish people as a whole."

The pamphlet said the Israeli government uses Israel Bonds money to "support the creation of… Arab town[s] in Galilee," as well as to "supply free medical services, electricity, water and fuel to our sworn enemies" and to "support judiciary and penal systems which release murderers of Jewish children – while it incarcerates Jews for defending their homes, their orchards, their lives."

The flip-side of the pamphlet contains some of the most hateful words I've ever read. Arabs are described as "the most savage and degenerate sub-humans on this planet" and "wild beasts that walk on two feet and speak Arabic." More frighteningly, left-of-centre Jews and Israelis are accused of "dream[ing] about erasing any trace of Jews and Judaism from the holy city of Jerusalem and the Temple Mount.

All of this was signed anonymously: "Published by your neighbours and friends who are deeply concerned for the survival of Israel and Jerusalem." There was no e-mail address or phone number – in other words, no way to respond.

I suspect that some of you reading this know who was responsible for spreading this vile brochure, but that doesn't change my point. The people behind this vicious, hateful – and, in my opinion, stupid – diatribe did not wish to be identified. They were too cowardly to back up their words with an identity, let alone offer others a forum to debate the (few) merits of their ideological position.

With this regular column, I have a space to mouth off about things that I deem to be important (or funny, or interesting). And, like other writers and thinkers, I recognize the responsibility and liability that is embedded in every word that I write and in every opinion I offer. If ever there is a natural enemy for people like myself, it's the sort who published what I have just finished describing.

Stand up and tell us who you are, "neighbours and friends who are deeply concerned for the survival of Israel and Jerusalem." I assure you that we, too, are concerned. And we would like to talk.

In the meantime, your continued silence only emphasizes your cowardice.

CHANUKAH SPINACH TIDBITS

CAPLAN'S
APPLIANCES • BED SHOPPE • OUTLET
a family of stores all under one roof

- 1 pkg chopped frozen spinach, thawed and drained
- 1 tblsp dried minced onion flakes
- 3/4 c grated parmesan cheese
- 1 c mini croutons
- 1 tblsp crushed garlic
- 1 egg, lightly beaten
- 2 tblsp butter, melted
- 1/8 tsp Tabasco sauce

Preheat oven to 375°. Lightly grease a cookie sheet with non-stick cooking spray. In a large bowl, mix spinach, parmesan cheese, onion, egg, croutons, butter, garlic and Tabasco. Mix well. Shape spinach mixture into 1" balls. Arrange on cookie sheet spaced 1" apart. Bake, uncovered, at 375° for 15 min. until croutons are slightly golden.

These tidbits can be prepared ahead of time by freezing on the cookie sheet and transferring to a sealable plastic bag for easy storage before baking. To bake, do not thaw them before baking; just increase baking time by 20 min.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

SPADINA LANDMARK: A sign celebrating the birth of the State of Israel adorns the front of Hyman's Book Shop, on the west side of Spadina Avenue, south of Oxford Street, in 1948. Standing on the doorstep is Gurion Hyman, then a 23-year-old apprentice pharmacist, who hand-painted the sign. "My father's store was like a parliament for Spadina – everybody came there," he recalls. "It was a centre for discussion." The shop sold books in Hebrew, Yiddish and English, as well as Judaica, greeting cards, Yiddish theatre tickets and other items. It opened in 1926 and operated until proprietor Ben Zion Hyman closed it down in the early 1970s after nearly half a century. [Photo courtesy of Gurion and Ruth Hyman]

Childless mother?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

When I began this article about childless women, the words I initially typed were "childless mothers."

Instead of writing "childless women," those were the words my fingers typed. Why? I think we perceive our existence and its forms in many different ways. However, there are certain components so deeply woven into our consciousness – like the human capacity to grow – that most of us, most cultures, would include them in a description of who we are as people. One of those things is motherhood.

URBAN WRITER

The Torah speaks at great length about childlessness pertaining to woman. We see this, for example, in the verse: "When Rachel saw she had borne no children to Jacob, Rachel became envious of her sister and said to Jacob, 'Give me children or else I will die.'"

There is much discussion about this statement, but suffice it to say, Rachel craved a child and seems to have defined her womanhood through motherhood.

In essence, my fingers reflected the societal perception that women can create babies, should create them and that materialism is at the core of this idea.

A woman I know is approaching the end of her childbearing years. My friend, a most ebullient human being, said that since she was little, she learned that one day, she was to fall in love, get married and have children.

"I believed that would happen," she laments.

She did indeed fall in love and get married, but the marriage ended after six years. While married, she didn't believe she was good enough to be a mom, and waited. Later, her husband wasn't interested in having a child, so they waited. But, she says, "time got away from me… and I was in my 40s."

My friend has run the gamut of feelings and thoughts about being a childless woman. She believes she would be a great mom, and motherhood would have been wonderful. Still, she states categorically, "I have accomplished many things and am making a difference in our world. I am better than I was five years ago."

She says our society is all about having children, and people can mourn excessively for women who don't. It's unfair, she adds, because "many women I know have come to grips with it and are leading full and whole lives."

She continues, however, that women shouldn't wait to fall in love, "as the clock ticks. If you want a child, have it now. One day, you're going to wake up and realize it's too late. I wish someone would have encouraged me."

I have always been envious of the female gift of conception, pregnancy and birth. Having the ability to create a child and doing so must often catapult a woman into a place of acute appreciation of Godliness, knowing that just as God can create a human being, so can she.

I mourn for those women who cannot have children, as long as they themselves mourn, but not for those who made a choice. I also grieve for those women who had children, but never wanted to.

I have learned through my friend that society can be insensitive to people without children, and single-minded in the perception of womanhood versus motherhood. This thought also hits home in Torah sources, as seen in Rachel's plea to Jacob, but a women's primary purpose is not necessarily fulfilled by simply having children. It is the responsibility of every woman to develop herself as a full and complete human being.

In essence, we must all give birth to ourselves. It seems my fingers were somewhat hasty.

Canada leads UN censure of Iran

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A resolution that Canada spearheaded censuring Iran for violations of human rights passed in a UN General Assembly committee last week, despite Iran's efforts to cast Canada as a stooge of Israel.

The resolution accuses Iran of gross human rights violations, including "torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, including flogging and amputations." It criticizes the Islamic state for executing juveniles, killing people by stoning and discriminating against women and girls. It also calls on Iran to end human rights violations affecting religious and ethnic minorities, among them Jews, Christians, Kurds, Arabs, Sunni Muslims and, in particular, Baha'is.

The resolution was co-sponsored by 42 mostly European and North American democracies, plus Israel, Fiji and Micronesia. Seventy members of the General Assembly's Third Committee voted in favour of the motion. It will now be put before the full General Assembly.

"The adoption of this resolution is a clear signal of the international community's concern for the human rights of people in Iran," said Foreign Affairs Minister Lawrence Cannon. "It sends a message of hope to the victims of state-sponsored brutality and to the human rights defenders who seek to effect positive change in Iran."

In a news release, Cannon said, "We will continue to promote Canadian values, such as freedom, democracy, human rights and the rule of law on the world stage."

The resolution "is the only statement of criticism of Iran's human rights record in terms of a resolution coming out of the General Assembly," said Anne Bayefsky, editor of Eye on the UN.

Bayefsky said Iran is one of "the world's worst human rights abusers... It's the most backward society in terms of human rights except for Sudan."

Israeli company to list on TSX

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When it comes to companies on international stock exchanges, 3GSolar wouldn't make it as a mid-cap. It's not even considered a small-cap, and it has to stand on its toes on a chair on a ladder to touch the pant cuffs of the micro-caps.

Still, the Israel-based company is slated to hold a unique distinction. Sometime next year, if all goes according to plan, 3GSolar will become the first Israeli company to be listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange (TSX).

Last week, representatives of the corporation were in Toronto to meet investment bankers and potential investors to tout the merits of the company, which is developing high-efficiency solar energy using dye solar cell photovoltaic technology aimed initially at off-grid rural areas.

Sheldon Freedman of 21 Ventures, a venture capital company that owns most of 3GSolar, and Benny Breen, its CEO, were hoping to raise $4 to $6 million to go with the $5 million (US) already invested in the firm. 21 Ventures provides seed money to up-and-coming high-tech companies that possess marketable products but not the capital or expertise to develop them for commercial application. Listing 3GSolar on the TSX will open the company to a much larger pool of capital and enhance the company's growth prospects, Freedman said.

SIR PRESIDENT?

Israeli President Shimon Peres wears the honorary order of St. Michael and St. George he received in London from Queen Elizabeth II when she conferred a knighthood upon him last week. The honour is given to individuals who have rendered services relating to foreign relations and has often been used to honour non-Britons. However, it does not come with a title. While in Britain, Peres also received an honorary degree from the University of London, addressed the British Parliament about the threat of Iran and met with Prime Minister Gordon Brown and Prince Charles. Seeds of Hate?

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada wants a Brooklyn-based company to stop distributing sunflower seeds in a package depicting what B'nai Brith calls a "negative, age-old stereotypical image of a hook-nosed Jew." B'nai Brith said it has received two complaints about the seeds - one from Ontario and one from Quebec – but that AHT International refused to stop distributing them or provide it with a list of Canadian retailers that sell them. The package shows a bearded, kippah-clad man with hands clasped and grinning devilishly. AHT's manager, Michael Tkach, told The CJN that the seeds, which have "Shalom from Israel" written in Cyrillic letters on the package, are aimed at Russian buyers, 80 per cent of whom are Jewish. He said the type of seeds are known as "Israeli seeds," hence the package design. Tkach said the AHT-designed image "was meant to be a funny picture. It wasn't meant to be a racial slur," adding that AHT is a Jewish firm. He said he's received no other complaints and has no plans to change the design if the company ships more seeds.

La Senza Head Dies

MONTREAL — Laurence Lewin, the president and co-founder of the La Senza lingerie chain who appeared as a judge on CBC TV's Dragon's Den in 2006, died Nov. 12 after battling lung cancer. He was 64. The U.K.-born Lewin co-founded La Senza in 1990.

WORLD

Canadian Arrested

TEHRAN — Hossein Derakhshan, the Iranian-Canadian blogger who visited Israel in 2006 and 2007 on his Canadian passport, has reportedly been arrested in Tehran for spying for Israel. The Iranian website Jahan News said Nov. 17 that Derakhshan, 33, who holds Canadian and Iranian citizenships, admitted to spying for Israel. Jahan News is linked to the Iranian intelligence community. The report said his confession included "intricate" points and that he attended various conventions in Israel. It also said Israeli news sources called him a friend of Israel. After his 2007 visit to Israel, there was a change in his blog posts, which had been pro-Israel. He also praised Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad after calling for his ouster. The Iranian-born Derakhshan came to Canada in 2000, but later left for England.

Cancer Claims Boy

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The 12-year-old Orthodox boy at the centre of a legal dispute over when life ends has died. Motl Brody's heart stopped on Nov. 15, 11 days after doctors at Children's National Medical Center in Washington, D.C., declared the New York boy legally dead because his brain activity had ceased. Motl's parents sued to keep their son, who had brain cancer, on life support, arguing Jewish law doesn't consider someone without brain activity to be dead. The hospital said in court filings that "scarce resources are being used for the preservation of a dead body." The family's lawyer told the Washington Post that "nature took its course before the judicial system ran its course."

Mosque Apologizes For Web Material

TORONTO — A Toronto mosque apologized to Canadian Jewish Congress for offensive postings on its website.

The Khalid Bin Al-Walid Mosque on Nov. 14 e-mailed Canadian Jewish Congress to "apologize without reservation to the CJC and the Jewish community at large for any and all comments that they have found offensive on our website, which we never intended in the first place."

Teachings on the site, khalidmosque.com, refer to non-Muslim westerners as "wicked," "corrupt" and "our clear enemies." To a query on whether Muslim women may wear high-heeled shoes, it says, "That is not permissible. It involves resembling the Disbelieving Women or the wicked women. It has its origin among the Jewish women."

The e-mail to the CJC, which was signed by Said Omar, acting chair of the mosque's board, added that "all of the writings to which offence has been taken have been or will be removed from our site immediately."

Len Rudner, CJC's Ontario region director, said a meeting is planned with mosque officials. He said it was important to meet with mosque representatives "to understand how this material got onto their site in the first place."

Rudner noted that a past posting on the site referred to "Zionist influence" that is "morally, religiously and ethnically destroying society after society."

Kosher meat supplier closes doors

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

With the announcement last week that Lazar Yitzchok Glatt Kosher Meat is no longer supplying kosher beef, local retailers are bracing for a shortage.

The Bielak family, owners of Lazar Yitzchok, which is supervised by the Kashruth Council of Canada and bears a COR hechsher, has placed a full-page advertisement in this week's CJN saying that they have "chosen not to pursue the kosher business at this present time."

No reason for the move was given, and at the time of publication, representatives from neither Lazar Yitzchok nor St. Helen's Meat Packers – Lazar Yitzchok's sister company and its slaughterer – had returned The CJN's calls.

The move by Lazar Yitzchok comes while Perl's main retail outlet at Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue remains closed following a fire in 2006, and after Agriprocessors, the largest kosher meat supplier in the United States, declared bankruptcy this month as it faces legal problems stemming from a massive immigration raid last May.

It also leaves Shefa Kosher Meats as Toronto's only kosher meat producer and wholesaler. Shefa's meat comes from Ryding Regency Meat Packers, which is now the only local slaughterer of kosher beef.

Jeffrey Kurtz, owner of Hartman's Kosher Meat on Bathurst Street in North York, said Lazar Yitzchok doesn't supply meat to his store, so it's not affected at this time.

But with Ryding Regency becoming the sole slaughterer of kosher beef in the Toronto area, "that may cause a shortage," Kurtz said.

"With less animals available, it sounds to me as if there will be less meat processed. Eventually, that will [trickle] down. [A number of local butchers] get their meat from Lazar Yitzchok. If they all have to rely on Shefa, something will have to give."

At Sobey's at Clark and Hilda avenues in Thornhill, kosher meat manager Dominic Zuccaro said his store currently gets its meat from Lazar Yitzchok, "and at this point, we don't know what is going to happen. We don't know if Shefa will be able to handle all the overflow.

"Our biggest concern is our customers. They are very loyal, and we want to be able to supply them with meat."

A spokesperson for Shefa refused to comment when contacted late last week.

Jay Spitzer, operations manager at the Kashruth Council of Canada, said he couldn't comment on Lazar Yitzchok's closing and would not speculate on supply and demand in the local kosher meat supply.

Prof's bail hearing postponed

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF

The bail decision in the case of a Lebanese-Canadian man alleged to have bombed a Paris synagogue in 1980 is on hold.

The judge in the bail hearing of Hassan Diab, 55, a part-time sociology instructor at the University of Ottawa, postponed his decision until next week, according to Benjamin Shinewald, Canadian Jewish Congress' national executive director and general counsel.

Shinewald, who is observing the trial, told The CJN late last week that the judge expected to "be away" this week and told Diab's guarantors that he won't rule on bail until after this weekend.

French authorities are seeking Diab's extradition, saying they have proof of his involvement in the bombing that killed three French citizens and one Israeli, and wounded 20 others. Earlier this month, two French judges issued an international arrest warrant for Diab, who holds dual Lebanese and Canadian citizenship. The bomb exploded just minutes before a crowd of people were due to emerge on Erev Shabbat from the synagogue in central Paris.

The sage of Jerusalem

From the editor's desk

In the winter now of a very long and distinguished career of public service on behalf of the Jewish state and the Jewish People, Shimon Peres may have finally found the perfect fit for his many talents and skills.

For most of his years in and around the Knesset, even when he served as prime minister, Peres was generally more appreciated abroad than at home.

But now, as president, the energetic octogenarian seems to have finally gained the appreciation, if not actually the affection, of many Israelis, too.

That's because the role of president in Israel, much like that of governor general in Canada, is mostly ceremonial and free of the deep-end scheming and plotting of politics in which all politicians swim. It's evident that most Israelis prefer Peres standing at the edge of the pool.

Among his duties, the president of Israel greets visiting foreign dignitaries. And Peres is a great greeter. He speaks several languages, reads widely and eclectically and thus knows how to make small talk, which is the staple of the all-important, first-impression discussions with newly arrived visiting dignitaries, either on an airport runway or at the president's official residence.

Moreover, Peres even walks like a dignitary – that is, unhurriedly, but purposefully, with abundant, unruffled calm.

In addition, over the past few years, Peres has even cultivated the sound of a dignitary, if to sound professorial and worldly is also to sound like a dignitary.

For example, he might say something like "The current economic crisis has been marked by global irresponsibility, but the future will require more responsibility, not less globality."

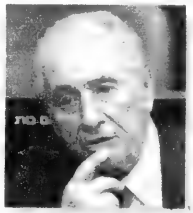
In fact, he said precisely that at the GA last week.

Speaking on the subject of "A Vision of Israel's Future" to more than 3,000 people packed into every available seat in the large auditorium of the Binyanei Haumah, Peres was in his element.

After an introduction by Kathy Manning, UJC executive committee chair, he strode slowly to the stage, the cavernous hall rocking to the sound of thunderous applause, sustained cheering and the hand-clapping accompaniment to the familiar song Heveinu Shalom Aleichem (We Have Brought Peace To You.)

In a wide-ranging discourse that touched on a number of topics, Peres held the audience rapt in near-adulatory attention.

He peered far into the economic horizon and saw the possibility of great achievements for Israel, based on the sound application of science and purpose to the country's tiny geography.



Shimon Peres

"We can build a shining and brilliant economy, if we can live on intelligence, knowledge, research and science," Peres said. "Wealth resides in the future. And Israel is the future. What we are going to discover here is more than what we have already accumulated.

"What matters is the intelligence of your country, not its length, its width or its breadth."

Peres called for a worldwide disengagement from the reliance of oil, which he described as "a major problem" and the major source of funding for terrorism.

"We should concentrate on solar energy," he suggested, noting Israel's preeminent expertise and status in the world as an innovative and creative harnesser of solar power.

On the subject of security, Peres said that "we have to fight terror with weapons that are of a new age."

On the subject of peace, he stated categorically that he believes there is a chance for an overall peace treaty in the Middle East that would not, however, include Iran, Hamas or Hezbollah. "The Arabs are more worried about Iran than Israel is. Iranian ambitions are frightening. It is the only country today that has imperial ambitions.

"We are much closer to achieving peace than we think," he added. "We do not have a right to miss this opportunity."

It's not only for pragmatic reasons, however, that Israel must make concessions if it is to attain peace with its neighbours, he said. Pursuing a path of peace, Peres emphasized, was "to choose the moral road above all others."

On the subject of relations with the newly incoming administration in the United States, Peres said: "I don't have the slightest doubt that relations between the United States and Israel will be warm, profound and responsible.

"America is not the policeman of the world," he added. "America is the country that helps other people to remain free."

These sentiments evoked the loudest cheers from the mostly American audience.

A CELEBRATORY PRELUDE TO THE DECLARATION OF A STATE

On Nov. 29, 1947, by a vote of 33 in favour, 13 opposed and 10 abstentions, the United Nations General Assembly voted to partition the western portion of British-ruled Mandatory Palestine into two states, one Jewish and one Arab. The resolution also called for Jerusalem to be internationalized. Despite being allocated mostly desert land, the Jews of Palestine supported the partition plan, but the Arabs of Palestine, as well as neighbouring Arab countries and the Arab League, rejected it. Though they knew the passage of the partition plan would lead to war, the Jews of Palestine celebrated in the streets as soon as they heard the final vote.

Yom Kippur program for Israelis 'opened a door'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbis from the 12 GTA synagogues that were involved in this year's inaugural Yom Kippur outreach program to local Israelis don't agree on how successful the pilot project was, but Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto, thinks it was a success despite mostly low turnouts.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks of Kehillat Shaarei Torah said he thinks it will be possible to repeat the project next year in a different way, but his assessment is that the initial effort "didn't work."

Only a couple of people showed up at his synagogue, which is located in an area that doesn't have a high number of Israeli residents.

"It was disappointing but not unpredictable," he said.

Yet Gissin, who initiated the project under the auspices of the consulate, believes that it "managed to touch a real need" for Israelis who are disconnected from Israel, he told The CJN in a telephone interview. As an example, he cited the number of Israelis who showed up at services at Chabad of Mississauga (between 30 and 50, according to Rabbi Yitzchok Slavin).

Amir Gissin

"It was really surprising," Gissin said. "In Israel, we say that even the most secular Israelis go to synagogue to hear the shofar on Yom Kippur," he said. "We managed to recreate an opportunity for them to do that without the barriers of having to pay for it [there are no fees to belong to a synagogue in Israel] or to be there in a way which is not familiar to them."

All the Yom Kippur services in the program were free of charge, geared to Israelis of all ages, and included prayer, the blowing of the shofar, discussion, explanations and an opportunity to ask questions.

Gissin said it's the job of the existing Jewish community and the Israeli community – not the consulate – "to get together to understand cultural differences, to have a mutually built relationship. I was very happy to be the facilitator for the project, but I think the continuation should be in the hands of others, be it the Israeli Forum, which represents Israelis in the city and is an arm of [UJA Federation of Greater Toronto], or the Israeli and Jewish media, and the different synagogues."

He said his aim in launching the project was to make sure "that for the young generation of youth who have Israeli parents who immigrated, that Israel will remain an attractive option. The fact that they speak Hebrew doesn't automatically make Israel relevant to them."

Israelis who have been here for a long time are starting to discover that their children have no attachment to Israel, he said. "All of a sudden they discovered that speaking Hebrew and visiting Israel once in a while is not enough."

He noted that synagogue can be intimidating for Israelis, particularly youth, who are not connected to that environment

Feedback he has received indicates that the program served as a catalyst for family discussion for Israelis who took part.

"I don't know whether they will choose to come again next year. I just know we opened a door for them."

Gissin said it was a "very important development" that the two communities "were forced to look at the world through the eyes of the other group. If you've done it once, you'll be able to do it again... As small and modest as it was, other ideas for doing things together can grow. At the end of the day, the way to bring and integrate Israelis into the Jewish community is by developing a community agenda."

Rabbi Harvey Meirovich, a Torontonian who made aliyah and is back in Canada spending a year at Beth Tzedec Congregation, said that four families with young children, as well as one adult, showed up for the Yom Kippur for Israelis program that he ran this year.

"They were looking for something for their kids," he said. "Perhaps [such a program] is what we should be planning for next year," he wrote in an e-mail report to Rabbi Michal Shekel, executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

Rabbi Meirovich told The CJN that one of the issues that large congregations grapple with is division of resources between serving a large group of members and reaching out to non-members.

Rabbi Michael Dolgin of Temple Sinai Congregation, the only other non-Orthodox synagogue involved in the project, said he was pleased to take part and "next year certainly we're happy to participate again."

The turnout at Temple Sinai was "really small," he noted. "But in the first year, we were more concerned about making it available.

"It was a late initiative," he added, referring to the planning process, which began with an initial meeting in late August.

Liana Kanengisser, director of the Israeli House, which is run under the auspices of the consulate, speculated that one problem may have been that shuls specified a set time for the Israelis to come, for the most part late in the day preceding the Neilah service. Thornhill's Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre, which had its doors open all day, attracted a few hundred people, she said.

"We didn't expect very huge numbers," Kanengisser said. "We think it was important just because the synagogues agreed to participate."

A different Arab offensive

Israelis were targeted last week by the Arab world with a new, different kind of offensive, one that did not require them to run to the nearest bomb shelter: an advertising campaign. The negotiating department of the PLO purchased full page ads in four English and Hebrew-language daily newspapers in an effort to persuade Israelis to support the Arab League peace plan of 2002.

On a full broadsheet framed by the flags of 56 countries, the Palestinian and Israeli flags appeared side by side near the top of the page under a large, 50-point size headline Arab Peace Initiative. Under the two flags appeared a smaller but still dominant sub-headline "57 Arab and Muslim Countries will Establish Full Diplomatic and Normal Relations with Israel in Return for Comprehensive Pease [sic] Agreement and Ending the Occupation."

The ad said it contained the "official translation of the full Saudi-inspired peace plan adopted by the Arab League Summit in Beirut on March 28, 2002." It also appeared in Arabic in a number of Palestinian papers.

As was pointed out by the government of Israel some six years ago when the plan was first made public, it falls short of certain minimum conditions. For example, the provisions regarding Arab refugees are untenable, as are the demands for total withdrawal to the pre-Six Day War borders.

It's significant that the Arab League is floating the plan once again, at this time, and that Mahmoud Abbas' PLO is casting it directly into the pool of Israeli public opinion.

Beyond the rooms where Palestinians and Israelis have been meeting these past many months, events are moving at a new pace. The imminent change in the American administration will undoubtedly bring change in the Middle East status quo. Yet neither Palestinians nor Israelis know what that change will be. More importantly however, the Sunni Arab and Muslim world grows increasingly alarmed at the prospect of a nuclear-armed Shia regime with grandiose hegemonic aspirations in Iran. The Arab League would like to solve the Palestinian-Israeli puzzle to remove it as a pretext for the Iranian involvement in the region.

The spokesperson for the Prime Minister's Office, Mark Regev, said last week "We see this initiative as an important step forward. The Arab League has called for recognition of Israel and for peace with Israel. This is important progress. We are willing to engage in open dialogue with all our Arab neighbours on the basis of the Arab initiative."

The question for Israelis is whether the Arab League and the PLO intend the plan to be all-or-nothing or a starting point for serious negotiations. Irrespective of the outcome of the general elections on Feb. 10, after Barack Obama is sworn in as U.S. president, they will know.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israelis jubilantly welcomed home six soldiers abducted from their posts in Lebanon. In return, Israel freed 4,500 Palestinian and Lebanese prisoners of war, many of whom had been accused of terrorist activities. Israeli military sources said about eight Israeli soldiers were still in the hands of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Response to Hart (1)

Lawrence Hart's continued attack on Hillel's advocacy efforts shows a blatant misunderstanding of the pluralistic approach that Hillel takes to create a safe environment on campus for Jewish students ("Conciliation hasn't worked," CJN, Nov. 6). In fact, it is unnerving that what Hart and his supporters at the recent panel discussion in Toronto seemed to support by their in-your-face advocacy is to use their children as pawns in the anti-Zionist, not anti-Semitic conflict on campus. The guerrilla tactics employed by those who erroneously believe Hillel is doing nothing serve only to bring further attention to the often marginalized anti-Israel events on campus.

That is not to say that anti-Zionism is not a problem on campus. But to put the blame squarely on Hillel is simply creating a scapegoat. In fact, Hillel actively addresses anti-Israel sentiment on campus. Just last semester, when an incredibly offensive letter condoning the terrorist attack on Harav Kook Yeshiva was printed in Excalibur, York's student newspaper, it was Hillel students and staff, supported by community organizations, who successfully put pressure on the newspaper to print a rebuttal article and secure an apology from the paper. This is but one small example of the successful multi-pronged Hillel approach.

For all his criticism of the community's advocacy efforts, not once have I heard Hart suggest a plan of action beyond turning our backs on shared values, dialogue and outreach. Hillel's approach focuses on the bigger picture, working with campus administration, working with the broader Jewish community and most importantly listening to the demands of our students. The quick-fix-guerrilla tactics will not work in the long run. Hillel has been down that road before, and it did not work.

As a recent university graduate and former president of Hillel at the University of Toronto, I found the column "Conciliation hasn't worked," by Lawrence Hart, to be inaccurate and misleading (CJN, Nov. 6).

Hillel of Greater Toronto's greatest achievement is its ability to empower Jewish students and provide them with many outlets for education and expression. While Hillel has an active advocacy program, its strength lies in its ability to engage and challenge students to discuss important issues and be proud of their Jewish identity.

Hart gives no credit to the resilience of Jewish students and fails to appreciate that when dialogue happens, it is with students who are willing to engage in a meaningful discussion. It is crucial to distinguish that the target audience on campus is the 90 per cent of students who are either uninvolved or those that are turned off by disruptive and biased events. Guided by this realization, Hillel's balanced approach to programming strives to meet its objective by engaging a diverse audience, while at the same time building bridges and promoting tolerance on campus.

In 2006, I worked with the University of Toronto Anti-Racism and Cultural Diversity Office and alongside Muslim, Christian, Sikh and Buddhist students in organizing a three- part series titled Spirituality and the Student Experience. The goal of these events was to create a safe space in which students of all religious backgrounds could share experiences and engage in meaningful dialogue. I can proudly say that each event drew between 200 and 300 students, and as a result we were able to promote dialogue and outreach initiatives that continue today.

So when I read Hart's article and find no concrete suggestions on how to combat anti-Zionist sentiment, I am left with the feeling that Hillel of Greater Toronto is indeed better positioned and suited to meet the needs of Jewish students. After all, it is through Hillel's positive programming that students get to shape their message and foster unity on campus.

Racquetball court overlookèd at new JCC

It was fascinating to see the advertisement featuring the Lipa Green Building expansion and the new Prosserman Jewish Community Centre (CJN, Nov. 13). These projects should indeed be a feather in the cap of the Jewish community of Toronto. However, what is shocking to many long-standing members of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre is the lack of tennis, racquetball and squash facilities. When details about this ambitious project were revealed to JCC members nearly two years ago, a petition of nearly 1,000 signatures was presented to the management of the JCC, pleading to include these badly needed racquet sports. Obviously, our voices fell on deaf ears. Such a beautiful and monumental structure to serve the community at large with absolutely no tennis, squash or racquetball facilities – what are these guys thinking?

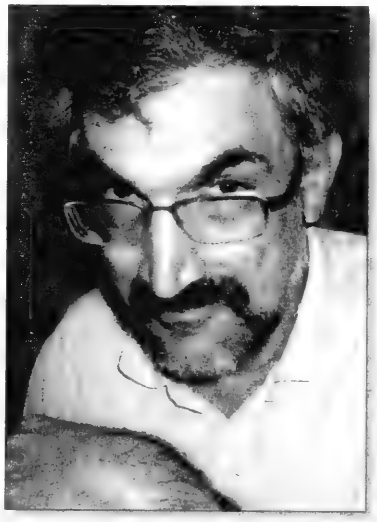
The wrong-headedness of the left

By SALLY F. ZERKER

The left has been wrong about everything. Well, maybe not about absolutely everything, but about everything that matters most. The left has been consistently and disgracefully wrong about the murderous governments of the 20th century.



Daniel Pipes

Leftists in the 1930s professed pacifist ideology, except in relation to the civil war in Spain, where they justified war on the ground of anti-fascism. But then when Josef Stalin made his pact with Adolf Hitler, no longer were they anti-fascists, and they resumed their pacifism posture, opposing any war against Hitler. But this was followed by yet another about-face when Germany attacked Russia. Then American and Canadian leftists became super patriots, attacking any former political friend who failed in their eyes to support America's war effort with sufficient zeal.

But with the end of World War II, when they became apologists for the new dictatorship that Stalin was creating in eastern Europe, the deceptions and hypocrisy of the left became glaringly obvious, especially after the revelations by Soviet premier Nikita Khrushchev in 1965 about the KGB and the Gulag. Linguist and political activist Noam Chomsky became the voice of the New Left, to be distinguished from the old left, which concentrated its program around the USSR.

For all his outspoken in-principle disdain of communism, when it came to the real world of international politics, Chomsky endorsed the brutal leaders of communism in Cuba – Fidel Castro and Che Guevera – as well as Mao Zedong and the founders of the Chinese communist state. Bear in mind that Guevera was not only a despot but a notorious anti-Semite who endorsed the fraudulent "international Jewish conspiracy" theory.

As for Mao, the New Left, following Chomsky, claimed that China had become a "just society" under Mao, dismissing reports coming out of China that Mao was a mass murderer. A recent publication by Jung Chang, called Mao: The Unknown Story, estimates the number of deaths perpetrated by Mao at 70 million – and this was during peacetime – and that Mao knowingly starved his own people in order to realize his dream of becoming a nuclear power.

The wrong-headedness of the New Left is blatant when we look at Chomsky's response to the Khmer Rouge, when it took over Cambodia in 1975. Both Chomsky and the New Left welcomed it. And when news emerged of the complete evacuation of the capital Phnom Penh, accompanied by reports of widespread killings, Chomsky offered a rationalization similar to one he had also provided for the terror in China and Vietnam, that there might have been some violence but that this was understandable under conditions of regime change and social revolution. Astounding, too, the New Left touted the wonders and miracles of Kim Il Sung of North Korea, that mass starver of his people.

It's bizarre but true that there is never any recognition by leftists that their own passionately held beliefs have been proven wrong again and again. On the contrary, my experience with academics on the left, who are in the majority in most universities, is disdain for any opinion other than that approved by the leftist fraternity/sorority. Open-mindedness is not a characteristic of the left.

The effect of such blindness is now impacting Canadian and other western universities in a most prejudiced way, taking the form of Israel-bashing and denial of free speech to any and all representatives of the "unanointed" point of view. Hence, two former Israeli prime ministers – Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak – were prevented by violent protest from speaking at Concordia University in 2002-03.

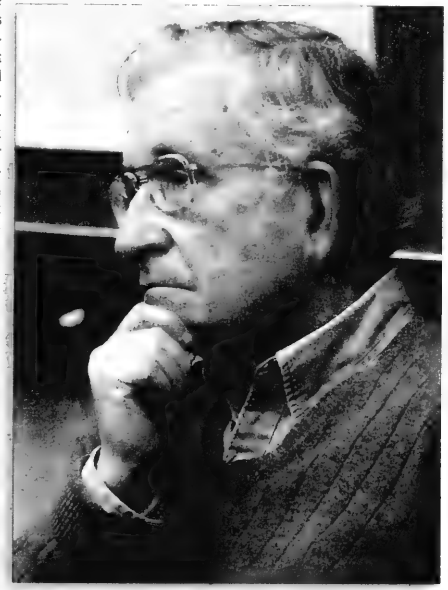
At York University, when the Middle East scholar Daniel Pipes was invited to speak in January 2003, he was attacked by York's leftist-dominated faculty union, the York University Faculty Associate (YUFA), which charged that Pipes was a racist and therefore should not be allowed to address the student body. This bogus charge not only induced historian Irving Abella to defend Pipes but also to write to YUFA as follows: "If you really wanted to protest a racist speaker, why was there such a deafening silence from YUFA when a visiting academic who has called Israel a Nazi state and described Jews as 'little Hitlers' recently lectured on campus?"

The atmosphere in Canadian universities is such that harassment of Jewish students is taking on the modes and methods of distressing, though familiar, anti-Semitism. Jewish students are afraid to expose themselves as Jews and are therefore apprehensive about wearing kippahs and the like. They are targeted with open hostility by anti-Zionist groups, and they fear reprisals if they challenge pro-Palestinian anti-Israel views, not only from other students but also from their leftist course directors.

The Big Lie, perpetrated by the combined forces of leftist academics and pro-Palestinian factions at the University of Toronto, York University, McMaster University and others in both Canada and the United States, is the linking of Israel with South African apartheid. It's a lie – and they know it's a lie – because there are no similarities between the power of Arab Israelis and what used to be the oppressed South African blacks.

Not only are there Arab citizens elected to the Knesset (Israel's parliament), but they have often represented the balance of power. Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's passage of the Oslo accords occurred with a majority of one, and it required the votes of five Arab members to put it over the top. As for Palestinians outside of Israel proper, they long ago could have had a state of their own through numerous efforts on the part of Israel, with the assistance of the United States, to implement a peace agreement and to build a Palestinian state, but they chose instead to reject those agreements and to carry on their war against the Jews.

University administrations have done nothing to stop a week-long assault on Israel's right to exist under the banner of Israel Apartheid Week. On the contrary, strong protest on the part of non-leftist professors have been spurned by these administrations. It is incumbent upon the presidents of these universities to stop these libelous and vicious attacks on Israel because the sponsors of the Israel Apartheid programs have openly offered their own "final solution," which is nothing less that the destruction of the Jewish state.



Noam Chomsky

The left is once again wrong, this time with respect to Israel. However, I'd better not hold my breath waiting for a signal from that contingent that they recognize the error of their ways.

The antidote to BlackBerry Brain

How long will you focus on this article? Will you interrupt reading it to answer your cellphone or check your e-mail?

Attention spans have been dramatically shortened. A horde of digital devices emitting beeps, bells and buzzes demand our deliberation. There's no time to think when there's urgent text messages and e-mails.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Even though I'm a rabbi, I'm an authority on digital disruption. I'm a BlackBerry toting, Internet blogging, cellphone conferencing kind of guy. For a while, I kept my BlackBerry on "buzz." Eventually, I started to feel phantom buzzing on my hip, even when I took my BlackBerry off. My brain continued to buzz on its own. My BlackBerry was driving me crazy, one buzz at a time.

I was suffering from "BlackBerry Brain." In fact, researchers in several countries have documented cellphone and personal digital assistant (PDA) addictions. These devices demand our constant attention. Eventually, you feel empty unless you're typing, tapping or texting something to somebody.

Our electronic masters take advantage of a design flaw that we humans have: a propensity to fixate on details.

Even in the area of religion, overzealous attention to detail can be destructive. The Talmud refers to the "foolish pious man" who refuses to save a drowning woman because it would be a breach of modesty. Details, in this case, get in the way. The pious fool ends up being blinded by petty pieties.

We may not be pious fools, but a lot of us are PDA fools. We fixate on this buzzing busybody of a BlackBerry and forget the people standing in front of us. I must admit there are times that I arrive home to my family, and instead of saying hello, I type away on the BlackBerry, knocking off the last e-mail of the day. At that moment, when "just one more e-mail" gets in the way, we experience the first symptoms of BlackBerry Brain.

As BlackBerry Brain worsens, we completely forget how to focus on other people. Old friends go out for lunch, and instead of catching up, they feign listening to each other while tapping out quick e-mails. With BlackBerry Brain, our friends get replaced with shiny new gadgets, soulless devices that just make a lot of noise.

To my mind, the affliction of BlackBerry Brain underlines the ever-increasing importance of the Sabbath. More than ever, we need a night when we turn off the BlackBerry and close our cellphones. More than ever, we need a night when the TV and computer remain dark. Our technology-drenched age needs tranquil moments when authentic, person-to-person connections can flourish.

Shabbat is the perfect time for that to happen, because true connections come from your soul, not your cellphone.

York U caved to pressure on holiday closings

Despite Barack Obama's election, and despite Canada's reputation as the nation of niceness, human rights must still be defended vigorously in Ontario, as well as in the other provinces.

The ugly scourge of racism persists. It may be better hidden than before, but it's nevertheless widespread and debilitating. Sexism, too, continues to afflict many women, with the media and powerful marketers particularly guilty of perpetuating rigid, ridiculous stereotypes. Religious and ethnic discrimination also remain prevalent and virulent. In my experience, Montreal is more fragmented and prejudiced than the three American cities I know best, New York, Boston and Washington, D.C.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Facing these challenges, the Ontario Human Rights Commission (OHRC) should have a full agenda – and it should work hard to separate frivolous complaints from serious ones.

But last spring, the OHRC advanced a discrimination complaint against York University. York's great crime was cancelling classes on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, and not holding exams on the first and last two days of Pesach. Tax dollars were wasted investigating the complaint, and the OHRC's initial report said the "practice of not scheduling classes on Jewish High Holy Days clearly results in differential treatment on the basis of creed."

Last June, investigators advanced the case to the full human rights commission. As a modern, typically cowardly, risk-averse university, York decided last month to end its practice. Of course, the school claims the complaint had nothing to do with its decision.

With a Jewish student body estimated at six per cent, York's policy was classy and welcoming. Jewish members of the university shouldn't have taken the policy for granted. It was an elegant and special accommodation. York legitimately could have decided, based on shifting demographics and internal complaints, that the days off, which non-Jewish students, faculty and administrators also enjoyed, were no longer necessary or somehow inconvenienced the university too much. But the way the policy was changed suggests this is one more story of unaccountable bubble-headed bureaucrats losing all sense of proportion and bulldozing lily-livered university leaders.

Given that each generation can't establish a new government, a democracy's inherited legitimacy stems from a leap of faith that all citizens make. With consent of the governed implied but no longer formally granted, democracies draw their legitimacy from acting reasonably. We accept the government, knowing we have some input into its decision-making via elections, but we also trust it to behave rationally. Accountability is essential. Setting up extrajudicial and extra-legislative tribunals dilutes the people's input in decision-making and strains that fragile bond between the people and their government.

Proportionality is equally important. In fact, the European Union consecrates proportionality as one of its fundamental legal principles, because a government should not act in a way that somehow goes beyond its main purpose.

This analysis challenges the very existence of a human rights commission. The OHRC describes itself as an "arm's length agency of government accountable to the people of Ontario through the legislature." What that essentially means is that except when the OHRC really oversteps and the legislature responds by limiting its powers or changing its personnel, this "arm's length" agency is an extrajudicial power with far too much latitude.

It should, therefore, be particularly careful not to overreach. An organization that expends any effort on a case such as York's High Holiday policy and fails to distinguish between – dare I say it – an act of reasonable accommodation and one of discrimination has overstepped its bounds dramatically. In fact, such a lack of proportionality mocks its mission.

The first dictionary definition of "discrimination" is the ability "to recognize or draw fine distinctions." But the political meaning of the word requires the presence of a malignant edge. Turning benign distinctions into something nefarious undermines the anguish true discrimination causes. Giving students time off for Jewish holidays is truly a victimless crime. It's a policy whose merits should be weighed by the institution that grants the days off.

This farce insulted the intelligence of all involved, demeaned the important tasks facing the OHRC, and diluted the moral power of all of us who are committed to human rights. The fact that York's administrators caved in and legitimated the farce only makes this case all the more tragic – but sadly typical.

I recently returned from a symposium in honour of Elie Wiesel's 80th birthday. For three intense days in Boston, distinguished professors from across the globe considered the writer's impact on such areas as Holocaust literature, theology, spirituality, and human rights.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Some – his contemporaries – recalled the first publication of Night in 1961, and they remembered organizing the very first conference to consider his writing, well before Wiesel was a Nobel Prize winner and a face recognized by millions. Younger professors – of literature, of Chassidism, of Bible, of Holocaust studies and myriad other fields – discussed their first encounter with Wiesel's work, their first encounter with the man, and the meaningfulness of his work on a personal level.

In his memoir, And the Sea Is Never Full, reflecting on the friendships with world leaders that he could never have imagined as a young boy in prewar Sighet, Romania, Wiesel mused, "What we imagine in fairy tales comes to pass." If we think of fairy tales not as the sweet children's stories of recent vintage, but as part of the older, more serious tradition of storytelling – that is, as profound and sober mythic representations of loss, hardship and awe – this quotation can serve as an epigram for the author's life: the unspeakable bereavement and suffering of the survivor, the growing public interest in his writing and lectures, the meteoric and unlikely rise to fame, even celebrity.

Of his body of published writing – of more than 25 books translated into many languages – few books have focused directly on the Holocaust. His first book, the Yiddish Und di Velt hat Geshvigen (And the World Was Silent), focuses on his experiences during the Holocaust and his reflections upon liberation, and is aimed at a Jewish readership. It has yet to be published in English. Night offers a distillation of this material, written and published first in French. While Jewish readers connect with many aspects of the book, it speaks to readers of all – or no – faith, in a language that is at once universal, and at the same time, contains a pointed challenge to Christianity and its implication in European anti-Semitism.

But Weisel's work, for the most part, deals with the aftermath of the Holocaust – what it means to live in a world in which the unthinkable has not only been thought of, but has occurred. Dawn, The Accident, Gates of the Forest, The Town Beyond the Wall and A Beggar in Jerusalem explore what it means to be traumatized, or haunted by losses, including the loss of an intimate sense of God's presence in the world. While concerned deeply with theological issues, these books also contemplate the breach of social contract, exemplified not only by the actions of the perpetrators, but by the non-action, the indifference, of neighbours – the bystanders.

Most of Wiesel's oeuvre, however, does not touch directly on the Shoah. His books retell stories about biblical characters, talmudic sages and chassidic rebbes, drawing on traditional sources, but inflected by the survivor's sensibility. In the end, what underwrites these stories is the Holocaust – whether the murder of one's family (Job), the unfathomability of martyrdom (the Akedah, or binding of Isaac), rebellion against injustice in God's order (Elisha ben Abouya) or cosmic despair (Reb Nachman of Brastlav).

Most inspiringly, out of death and despair, Wiesel has become a life-affirming teacher, and not in a trivial way. A professor at Boston University since 1976, Wiesel continues to be dedicated to and engaged with his students. He teaches regular seminars, even when it means flying in from some part of the globe where he has a different commitment.

At the symposium, former students reflected on the impact of this extraordinary teacher on their lives, values and striving for meaning. His classes plunge students into the close reading of texts – whether the Bible, midrash or modern literature – encouraging them to read themselves into the texts and to read the texts in their own lives. His class discusses questions of ethics, faith, meaning.

Over dinner, someone began playing a guitar and singing the chassidic melodies of Wiesel's childhood. Someone grabbed my hand and pulled me into a circle, and there we were, dancing around this consummate storyteller, this maggid, this teacher, celebrating his 80th birthday. Ad meah ve'esrim.

In 1973, when Israel and Egypt fought the Yom Kippur War, an Israeli scholar and critic of Iraqi origin named Sasson Somekh published the first English-language work on the prolific Egyptian novelist Naguib Mahfouz (1911-2006). By all accounts, The Changing Rhythm: A Study of Naguib Mahfouz helped solidify Mahfouz's reputation internationally. Fifteen years after its appearance, Mahfouz achieved renown as the first Arab novelist to win a Nobel Prize in literature. "It wasn't my intention to make him famous," said Somekh, the doyen of Arabic literary studies in Israel. "Besides," he added modestly, "he really didn't need me."

Sheldon Kirshner in Tel Aviv

Somekh, however, can take credit for having introduced Mahfouz to the wider world and can bask in the acclaim that The Changing Rhythm was the only work in English on Mahfouz for a long time. "There are now 20 books about him in English," said Somekh, who retired six years ago as a professor of Arabic literature at Tel Aviv University and who now instructs and advises PhD students as a professor emeritus.

Somekh, 74, discovered Mahfouz, the author of 34 novels and hundreds of short stories, decades ago. "He was a good writer, though not the best," he observed in an interview at his condominium in north Tel Aviv, near the shimmering Mediterranean Sea.

In particular, he liked Cairo Trilogy, in which Mahfouz magically described the rhythms of life in the bustling Egyptian capital between World War I and World War II. Apart from Cairo Trilogy, Mahfouz's works include The Children of Gebelawi, Miramar and Arabian Nights and Days.

Somekh became one of the leading authorities on Mahfouz after writing a PhD thesis on him at Oxford University in the 1960s. Originally, Somekh specialized in Hebrew linguistics, pursuing this topic at the Hebrew University and Tel Aviv University. He segued into Arab literature after being promised a job at Tel Aviv University after his studies in Britain.

Returning to Israel three years later, Somekh was one of the founders of Tel Aviv University's Arabic department, one of five such departments at Israeli universities today.

Reworking his doctorate degree, he wrote The Changing Rhythm, which has yet to appear in either Hebrew or Arabic. He blames himself for not having translated it into Hebrew, but he cannot understand why it has not been picked up by a publisher in Egypt. (One can only surmise that Egyptian publishers would be uncomfortable publishing a book by an Israeli about Egypt's greatest writer.)

Nevertheless, Somekh struck up a personal relationship with Mahfouz – the scion of a devout Muslim family – in the wake of Israel's historic peace treaty with Egypt in 1979. "I met him for the first time in 1981," he recalled. "We became very good friends. I met him many times in Cairo. He was a very nice, kind, down-to-earth person." Mahfouz never paid a reciprocal visit to Israel because he was an extremely reluctant traveller, explained Somekh.

Mahfouz supported Egypt's rapprochement with Israel, backing Anwar Sadat's visit to Jerusalem in 1977. "Politically, Mahfouz was a man of peace," said Somekh, who directed the Israel Academic Center in Cairo from 1996 to 1998. "He was dedicated to it and was willing to meet Israelis. He accepted Israel."

Asked why Mahfouz appeared to endorse Palestinian suicide bombings at the height of the second intifadah, Somekh said he never actually justified them. Instead, his intention was to explain Palestinian desperation. "He opposed terror and Islamic fundamentalism."

Banned in many Arab countries for almost a decade after supporting Egypt's peace treaty with Egypt, Mahfouz was placed on a death list after defending Salman Rushdie, the British author who incurred Iran's wrath after writing The Satanic Verses.

In 1994, Muslim extremists stabbed Mahfouz in the neck outside his home in Cairo, and subsequently, he was continually protected by a bodyguard.

Like many Israelis, Somekh is disappointed with the cold tone of Israel's peace treaty with Egypt. "I thought it would usher in a new era, but the Palestinian question doesn't allow Egypt to accept us 100 per cent. Egyptians on the street are not against Israel, but intellectuals are under the sway of Nasserism and oppose Israel."

Aside from his professional and personal interest in Mahfouz, Somekh has forged a niche for himself as one of Israel's most respected translators of modern Arabic poetry into Hebrew. A poet himself, he has translated the works of some of the finest Arab poets: Mahmoud Darwish, who lived in Israel until 1970, joined the PLO and now lives in the West Bank; Sameeh al-Qassem, an Israeli Arab who resides in a village in the Galilee; Sa'adi Yussug, an Iraqi; Unsi al-Hajj, a Lebanese, and Adonis (Ali Ahmed Sa'eed), a Syrian. Somekh will soon publish his fourth anthology on contemporary Arab poetry.

Four years ago, he published his memoir, Baghdad, Yesterday, in Hebrew, in which he resurrected the bygone world of Iraqi Jewry. An English edition, which is available on Amazon.com, was released in 2007. Part two, Call it Dreaming, which was published recently, covers the period from his arrival in Israel to his retirement.

Somekh was born into a well-to-do family whose parents spoke English and French rather than Arabic. "They were western-oriented. They felt they belonged to Europe. They didn't hate Arabic, but felt that their future lay in the West. They were afraid that Arab nationalism would turn militant and anti-Jewish."

Their sentiments were doubtlessly shaped and deepened by the farhud, the June 1941 pogrom in Baghdad that resulted in the deaths of some 180 Jews. The violence did not spill into their middle-class neighbourhood, but it affected perceptions and attitudes profoundly.

Somekh, who was a boy when it occurred, attended a Jewish high school in Baghdad, where one of his teachers, an Arab, opened his horizons to Arab literature. He immersed himself in Arabic novels, began writing poetry and frequented cafes where writers and poets met.

Years later, after leaving Iraq, Somekh continued to maintain contact with some of these Iraqis, many of whom opposed the Baathist regime and lived in exile in Europe. Three of his Iraqi friends from this era visited Somekh in Israel. "They were ready to see the good side of Israel and were very happy to meet Iraqi Jews in Israel," said Somekh, who considers himself an Israeli patriot.

In common with the vast majority of Iraqi Jews, Somekh immigrated to Israel in 1951, temporarily leaving his parents and his aunt behind in Baghdad.

"I was not a Zionist. I didn't believe all Jews belong in Israel. I just felt I had no future in Iraq. There was no way I could enter university. I could only be an employee in a bank, like my father, or in a commercial venture. I couldn't be an intellectual. The situation was unpleasant. Our neighbours were becoming unfriendly. People would curse you on the street."

Somekh had no problem integrating into Israeli society, but his parents, especially his father, found it difficult. "He never learned Hebrew and was not happy here."

He thinks of himself as an Arab Jew rather than as a Sephardi. "I was raised in an Arab milieu. I belong to the last generation of Iraqi Jews who lived side by side with Iraqis of other religions, speaking a common language and participating actively in Iraqi culture. I feel very much at home in Arabic culture."

Although he generally has fond memories of Iraq, he has not been back since and doubts he will ever return, given his age and the anarchy there.

He supported the 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq as a way of ridding the country of Saddam Hussein, but is not optimistic that Iraq can extricate itself from the mess it is in today.

"Iraq," he said, "doesn't work."

The Romspen Mortgage Fund.

There's never been a better time.

We Are What The Stock Market Isn't

Predictable. Stable. And a world away from volatile. The Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund (RMIF or the Fund) prides itself on its disciplined investment strategy and impressive results. That's precisely what has made the Fund a good investment choice – particularly in these turbulent economic times. Because we are risk averse, we've made a point of investing only in qualified Canadian commercial first mortgages – no stocks, no bonds, no mutual funds or REITS – and this strategy is proving particularly effective in today's investment landscape. And unlike other investment vehicles, the value of units in the Fund has never fluctuated: it has remained at $10, regardless of stock market performance.

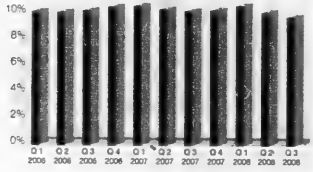
Since its inception, the Fund has consistently offered investors enviable returns. Consider the numbers: The RMIF has yielded an average annual net return of 9.74% since inception, and an impressive 10.14% when the monthly interest is reinvested through the automatic unit reinvestment program.

Performance

Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund



Monthly Income

The income the Fund earns is distributed to investors every month, making it an attractive investment for current and future retirees who require a regular income stream. Investors can choose to have the income either deposited directly into their bank account or reinvested through our automatic unit reinvestment program.

Experience That Matters

The Fund is managed by Romspen Investment Corporation (RIC). The founding principals of RIC have been administering mortgages on behalf of investors for over 35 years. With such extensive management expertise, it isn't surprising that the RMIF has never experienced a losing month.

Birthright copes with $35 million less for 2009

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Taglit-Birthright Israel is going to be taking fewer participants to Israel in 2009 because of a $35-million decrease in next year's budget, Taglit-Birthright Israel's Toronto-based vice-president of education and operations said.

But Elizabeth Sokolsky would not characterize the funding drop as a budget cut.

Rather, she said that last year, the organization had a significant increase in funding "due to a very generous gift that we received from Miriam and Sheldon Adelson [the American billionaire and CEO of Las Vegas Sands Corp.] to help us deal with the wait-list."

Waiting list continues to grow

Birthright Israel, an organization that provides free 10-day trips to Israel for Jews aged 18 to 26, had a budget of $110 million (US) for the 2008 fiscal year, but in 2009, it's forecasted to have a budget of $75 million, JTA reported.

In 2006 and 2007, Adelson donated more than $65 million to Birthright Israel, and in 2008, he pledged to donate $20 million for 2009 and $10 million for 2010.

"Yes, we have less money in our budget for next year, which does impact on the amount of kids that we are taking, but it is basically [because of] one gift," said Sokolsky, who wouldn't comment on whether the decrease in funding has anything to do with the fact that the stock of Adelson's casino company has plunged over the past year.

"The [Adelson] gift was originally given to us to help us deal with the huge wait list that we have for the program, which it certainly did. There are still thousands and thousands of kids who are wait-listed, but we don't know yet what the situation is going to be like for 2009."

Sokolsky said that funding is always different from year to year, because of the partnership Birthright has with the Israeli government and with Jewish federations, as well as private donors.

"The government of Israel gives us $1 for every $2 we raise. That also fluctuates, depending on how much we bring in," she said.

"Working with these numbers is always logistically challenging, but we manage."

Sokolsky added that this decrease in funding will have the same effect on Canadians as it will on potential participants from other parts of the world, because each country gets a percentage of the funding.

Canada gets about 10 per cent of the funding that is allocated for North American applicants, which Sokolsky said is favourably disproportionate, because Canadian applicants make up less than 10 per cent of the North American numbers.

She said that this past summer, 24,000 North American Jews, many of whom were on the waiting list, went to Israel with Birthright.

Despite that, Sokolsky said the waiting list of tens of thousands of hopefuls continues to grow.

"Just this winter alone in North America, we are taking just over 10,000 kids, and we have over 20,000 eligible applicants," she said, adding that the 10,000 that were left over from the last registration period were added to the waiting list of other applicants who couldn't get onto earlier trips.

"We close registration really early. If we kept registration open for longer, we'd have even longer waiting lists."

Sokolsky said Canadian Birthright staff try to take care of their own with low-key fundraising efforts.

"We had a parent who just recently gave us a $100,000 challenge in order to raise some money here in Canada for kids to go. They will match up to $100,000 for every gift that we get for 2008/09. We have Debbie Kimmel, who is the chair of the Birthright Israel Foundation, and she has been asking individuals to donate $5,000 to match this $100,000, and it's going well. We just started this last week," Sokolsky said.

"It is the support of the community that helps make that happen."

She said she doesn't want the Canadian Jewish community to think that just because philanthropists such as the Adelsons, Andrea and Charles Bronfman, and Judy and Michael Steinhardt donate millions of dollars that the program isn't in need of more funding.

"That is not the case at all. The bottom line is that the more money we have, the more kids we bring."

Meanwhile, last week, the Jewish Agency for Israel's board of governors nixed a plan by its budget committee to cut its allocation to Birthright Israel by $1 million (US).

The agency, which concluded its board meetings in Jerusalem last Thursday night, passed $45 million in cuts to its core budget for 2009.

The budget committee had suggested a $1-million cut to Birthright, but the proposal met with fierce opposition, particularly from board members who are heads of Jewish federations, and was ultimately shot down. Instead of cutting the Birthright budget, the Jewish Agency resolved to ask for an additional $1 million from the Israeli government.

Even at $10 million, 3GSolar is still a tiny player in the corporate world. In American capital markets, a market capitalization of $50 million or less makes it a nano-cap, the smallest classification for publicly traded companies. From $50 million to $300 million, it would be a micro-cap.

Raymond King, senior manager of global diversified industries, listings business development for the TSX, said the exchange is eager to list Israeli and other international firms. "We feel Israel is one market being under-served globally, in part due to higher amounts needed to list on NASDAQ and AIM [Alternative Investment Market, a sub-market of the London Stock Exchange]," two alternative markets available for Israeli companies.

"Israel is a great market for our sweet spot" – small to medium-sized enterprises. "Our strength is serving the sub-$600-million capitalization range. That range is not being served globally, and that's where we're strong," King said.

King, who calls himself "an honorary Israeli" for his seven visits to the country, said the TSX has co-operated with the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce, local lawyers and businesspeople to develop a presence in Israel.

"When we first got there, they didn't know anything about us. The first trips were educational in nature."

Israelis, he continued, were fixated on NASDAQ, the U.S. stock market that features many technology companies. Israeli companies trail only American firms in the number of listings on NASDAQ.

Many Israeli entrepreneurs "saw a listing on NASDAQ as a sign of success," King continued. "Ninety per cent of companies on NASDAQ fail to sustain listings and do not get noticed by analysts." As a result, two-thirds of all NASDAQ stocks are "orphaned, ill-equipped stocks."

The result is thin trading and a drop in share price, he said.

The TSX Venture Exchange might be best-suited for 3GSolar, King said. "It's designed to support companies at that level in getting them access to North American capital, visibility in the marketplace, and to continue to grow."

Freedman said Israeli companies are becoming aware of the TSX as an alternative to NASDAQ, AIM and the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange. The latter two are "illiquid" [small trading volume] and expensive, he said.

"Everybody who is interested in seeing Israeli tech companies floated in Canada is looking," Freedman said. "All players are looking at us, because it could be the first one."

Floating Israeli company stock is complicated by tax laws involving three jurisdictions (Canada, Israel and the United States, where many of 3GSolar's investors reside), securities law in Canada and Israel, corporate law, currency issues, tax treaties and other factors, he said.

Freedman, a Toronto lawyer who has worked in the United States and Israel, said listing 3GSolar on the TSX will afford it "the prestige and visibility we wouldn't get at the lower levels of NASDAQ... In Toronto, our little deal will be treated with respect."

Canaccord Capital and Sandfire Securities are underwriting the deal. It could close as early as February.

Janis Koyanagi, director of business development and strategy for the TSX, said it is too early to confirm that date, though 3GSolar has expressed its intent to list with the TSX.

"We have a very focused effort on building our business in Israel, and we see a great opportunity there," Koyanagi said.

3GSolar's listing, when it occurs, "opens the door to other Israeli companies. It's a big coup for us."

TopBunk heightens interest in Jewish camping

By A.M. Segal

When Mark Kachuck went to Camp Shalom last summer, he had the time of his life.

"It was so much fun," says the grade 8 student at Dublin Heights Public School in Toronto. "There was a lot of bonding and it became a second home for me."

While Kachuk's deep affinity for overnight camp is shared by many Jewish kids, his experience was a little different. Kachuck participated in TopBunk, UJA Federation's Jewish Camp Incentive Program.

The unique endeavour provides first-time campers in the Greater Toronto Area, who don't attend a Jewish day school and are not intensively exposed to Jewish school surroundings, with financial incentives to go to a qualifying Jewish overnight camp.

The initiative is intended to be a portal to building Jewish identity, in addition to the bounty of social rewards and the lifelong memories that camp creates. TopBunk is an outreach program, designed to get kids and their families to be more connected to the Jewish community.

Research shows that camp plays a pivotal role in enhancing Jewish affiliation and fostering a sense of community. For instance, American data indicates that Jewish camp alumni are more likely to join a synagogue and much more likely to join a Jewish community centre when compared to Jewish adults who never went to a Jewish camp.

"It's an important form of Jewish education that will create lasting memories and help build a Jewish network for the campers, especially for kids who do not receive regular exposure to Jewish identity development at day school," said Dr. Ron Polster, Director of Jewish Camping Initiatives for UJA Federation.

In Kachuck's case, the research appears to ring true. "I really liked the way they incorporated Jewish themes at camp," says the 13-year-old. "It gets you more interested in a fun way."

"Currently, 12 per cent of children eligible for Jewish overnight camp actually attend," notes Polster. "Our goal with TopBunk is to triple the number of kids within our target market going to Jewish camps within the first three years of the program." To find out more, please visit www.topbunk.ca.

Mercaz places priority on education quality

A new initiative to significantly enhance the quality of education at Jewish day schools is underway.

The Quality Review & Enhancement (QRE) program for day schools will focus on improving learning, professional development for teachers and principals, along with bolstering communication and the sharing of resources between schools.

"Every public school board engages in a similar initiative and we feel it is time to look at the community of day schools to see how they are doing, and to develop recommendations to move forward," says Yael Seliger, project director and Vice-President, UJA Federation, The Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education – the Mercaz. "The ultimate goal of QRE is to enable all learners to reach their highest potential."

After launching a pilot project last year at four schools, Mercaz is now ready to expand the scope of QRE across the board.

It is expected that all schools in the system will be fully engaged in the initiative within two years.

Schools will develop ongoing School Improvement Plans (SIPs) that will monitor and upgrade such areas as assessment, learning profiles, teaching techniques and curriculum expectations.

One of the primary elements of QRE is a focus on 'differentiated learning,' which refers to each student learning in his or her own particular fashion. Seliger envisions the 'differentiated learning' phase to be completed in 5 years

"Teachers need to approach each student in the class as an individual," says Dr. Seymour Epstein, Senior Vice-President, UJA Federation, The Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education. "They need to evaluate what the student has learned in his or her own individual way. Does the student know how to apply that learning and can they replicate that autonomously, in the future?"

Seliger notes that the QRE process will vary in the way it is implemented from school to school. A multitude of initiatives will take place, including classroom observations, focus groups, interviews, evaluations, as well as formal data collection and analysis.

While each school will be reviewed, Seliger emphasizes that the bigger aim is for staff, students, schools and the whole system to reflect and improve.

"My hope is that teachers will be able to reflect in a systematic way not only on the content, but more on the pedagogy," she relates. "It is an absolute must to strengthen the system by having all schools speak effective pedagogic language."

The QRE initiative is comprehensive, with experts from the Ontario Ministry of Education, as well as the Harvard Graduate School of Education, contributing.

The Event for Jewish Parents: Fun for the Family

By A.M. Segal

With so many Jewish programs and services available for kids across the Greater Toronto Area, it could take quite a bit of time to decide which options are best for you.

To help make the search a little easier, GetCentred The Event for Jewish Parents is being held on Sunday, November 30, offering an educational, entertaining and fun-filled forum to see exactly what's available.

"The Event for Jewish Parents will help provide parents with information about options for various services, including both formal and informal Jewish education, covering summer camps, community services and youth organizations," says event organizer Miriam Allman."We are expecting it to be a very exciting time."

The forum will showcase exhibits with representatives on hand to answer questions and offer insight.

While the parents are doing their homework, kids will be entertained by a wide range of activities, including arts and crafts and live music. All families will also have the chance to get a free photo taken by a professional photographer. And what would a Jewish event be without a bounty of kosher food?

"Instead of parents running around and spending a lot of time researching, this is a great chance to find out everything in one venue," says Allman. "This way, they will have all of the information in front of them, with knowledgeable people there to answer questions."

Similar events in previous years have proven to be successful one-stop shops for parents to make a decision about enrolling their children in a formal or informal Jewish education program. But this year's version is more comprehensive.

Organizers are expecting about 300 people to attend the Event for Jewish Parents, which is being held at Six Degrees, located at 2335 Yonge Street, from 1:30 to 4:30 p.m..

On site registration to the GetCentred We Have Proud Kids Contest will also be available. Contest prizes include $10,000 towards tuition, a MacBook Air or an iPhone.

The event is being sponsored by UJA Federation's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercaz) and Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto.

Makom makes its mark in Toronto

As he stood before the sea of students, all gathered at Toronto's Bialik Hebrew Day School for an assembly to remember the late Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Eran Shpigelman felt a wave of emotions.

And that is precisely the point of why Shpigelman and seven fellow young emissaries, have ventured to Toronto for a year.

The dynamic group is part of an initiative called Makom - The Israel Engagement Network - a partnership of Jewish communities and the Jewish Agency for Israel. Makom's partner in Toronto is UJA Federation.

As the name implies, Makom endeavours to provide young people and broader Jewish communities in the Diaspora, with hands-on, experiential learning about what Israel really is.

"The aim of Makom is to bring Israel in different ways to the Toronto Jewish community," said Makom director Sarah Mali, from UJA's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (The Mercaz). "They are here to be compelling and innovative and really speak to people in a way that creates new relevance in their relationship with Israel."

Shpigelman and his fellow emissaries, all of whom are pre-army teens, are being hosted by families from five different Toronto synagogue congregations.

Makom emmisaries with Sarah Mali

Throughout the year, they organize, lead and participate in a wide variety of synagogue activities, as well as Jewish day schools and supplementary programs, initiatives at Jewish camps in the summer months and events with Israeli Scouts.

"Wherever the members of Toronto's Jewish community see the emissaries, be it at schools, prayer services or in their homes, the young emissary is a metaphor for Israel," said Mali. "By connecting with them, the community is gaining insight into current Israeli culture, which the emissaries live and breathe."

"I have never been exposed to real Jewish life outside of Israel," he related. "It is incredibly interesting to me to see how and what Jewish people need to do here to express their Judaism. And it has made me so proud to see how strongly people here are connected to Israel."

Although the focus is on enriching the local community's concept of and relationship with Israel, Mali points out the experience has the potential to make an indelible mark on the Israelis, too.

"Being in Toronto provides these young people with a unique opportunity to develop and enrich their Judaism," she said. "It will give them a more nuanced relationship with their religion and equip them with excellent training for the future."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

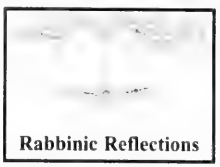
It's a righteous act to use foresight

By RABBI KAREN THOMASHOW

During the 1930s, could statesmen in England and America have behaved more aggressively in stemming the tide of Nazism, had they anticipated what we now know? Would the Roman Senate have given so much power to Augustus had they known he would consolidate power so ruthlessly? Would we have withdrawn our funds from the stock market had we anticipated the downturn to come?



Throughout our past, there has been a fundamental tension between hindsight – what we now know – and foresight – what people at a given time may have known. As historian David M. Potter once wrote, "Hindsight… [is] the historian's chief asset and his main liability." The inherent tension between foresight and hindsight has been a key determinant of human behaviour, and a recent Torah portion provides an illustration of this.

In parshat Vayera, God appears to Abraham, telling him that soon the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah will be destroyed on account of the sinful behaviour of their residents. But before God tells this to Abraham, God says, "Shall I hide from Abraham that which I am about to do?" Nehama Leibowitz calls this "a decisive moment in world history, [in which] we are allowed to listen in to the considerations which were uppermost in the Divine mind."

We know that God told Abraham that soon the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah would be destroyed. But what happened in those intimate counsels of the Divine seems to be greater than the words that God used alone. Rashi believes that in those intimate counsels, God decided to hand over to Abraham "knowledge of the closeness of Providence."

To understand the significance of this, a brief word about the etymology of the word providence. The word providence is the vernacular fusion of the Latin words pro, meaning fore, and vidi meaning sight. Providence, therefore, is fore-sight. What did God decide to hand over to Abraham within the "intimate counsels of the Divine?" God gave Abraham foresight.

God gave Abraham the ability to have knowledge of the future when those living in Sodom and Gomorrah had no information of what was imminent. Abraham immediately responded to the information that he was given. By intervening, Abraham acknowledged that there are implications to having information. We, too, receive information every day, and when we do, we are obligated to use that information for good.

Did God look to Abraham to use the information that God intentionally shared with him for good? According to Ramban, God decides to share His providence with Abraham because God had singled out Abraham to be the progenitor of a great nation, and, therefore, God wanted Abraham to instruct his progeny to do what is just and right. If God gave Abraham information hoping that Abraham would intervene, then that intervention – that use of information – constitutes righteousness. The Torah tells us that it's a righteous act to use foresight.

The reality is that we are on our own as we guide our moral compasses in one direction or another. We don't have the privilege of God handing us information on the heels of a conversation with Himself as to whether or not we should have it. But we do have what God does give us, which is a strong model to do the right thing. When we don't know what will be, we act according to our best judgment. However, when we have information that can affect the future, we are compelled to use it.

We are taught, in the Mishnah, "Eizeh hu chacham? Haroeh et hanolad." In other words, "Who is wise? The individual who uses foresight."

The angelic struggle

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The upcoming Torah portions include the narrative describing Jacob returning home to Canaan after a lengthy absence.

He fled in fear of his brother, Esau, and a return to his home necessitates a confrontation with Esau. On the evening before this confrontation, Jacob sits alone, perhaps contemplating whether the next day will bring a joyous or a violent reunion. As he sits alone he becomes aware of an intruder and grabs this person. He wrestles with him all night. Just before dawn, the intruder demands to be freed, and Jacob demands a blessing in return.

The intruder asks Jacob what his name is and then renames him by blessing him with the name "Israel." The Torah alludes to the fact the intruder is an angel, and the name "Israel" is later formally given to Jacob by God.

The reason the angel gives for the name "Israel" is that Jacob has wrestled with man and with God, and was able to withstand the struggle. The word "Israel" appears in the future tense, thus it is a reflection of their meeting as well as a prediction for the future. It is a destiny.

Although the actual name change is not complete until God enacts the change, the role of the angel here is one of educator. By fighting with Jacob and, in fact, injuring him, the angel has proven to Jacob that although the struggle can feel overwhelming at times, he is able to withstand it and grow from the experience.

The sages often speak to us of angels and our interactions with them. One of the richest texts involves a description of our soul as it journeys from the upper realms into the womb of its mother, through the birth process, the life journey and ultimately the final journey back to the heavenly realms. Every step of the way, according to the Tanhuma, the person objects to the change, and it's the individual's personal angel who coaxes, prods and forces the changes.

The soul doesn't want to be put into the womb, but is forced in. At that same time, the angel and God discuss the destiny of the soul's life journey, but they can't discuss whether or not the soul will be God-fearing, since that is part of free will and cannot be violated.

The soul is taught by its angel to love the time in the womb. It does not want to be born, but when the birth process begins, the angel pushes the baby out into the world. With its first breath, the soul forgets its angel teacher and begins its life journey. When it's time to die, the soul doesn't want to leave this world, and it's the same angel teacher who appears to the soul, which recognizes the angel instantly. The angel forces the soul to leave the body and escorts it back to the heavenly realms.

In each instance, the soul struggles with the angel. The soul doesn't want the change. In each instance, the angel teaches the soul about the inevitable movement forward – about the struggles, the sense of defeat and ultimately the security of knowing that it will endure.

Jacob's struggle with the angel seems to be one of those unique Torah moments, inaccessible to the experiences of the average person. But it's interesting how the sages teach us that the same angelic struggle occurs within all of us at every threshold of our existence. This is the true journey of "Israel."

The brutal Assyrian war machine

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

The Assyrians were among the most feared and hated empires of antiquity in the ancient Near East. They feature prominently in a number of biblical stories and are often seen as the agents of God's wrath and retribution for the people of Israel and Judah.

The Assyrians were around as a people by the early second millennium BCE. But it is at the end of that millennium that they began their rise to prominence, amid the chaos that marked the end of the Bronze Age.

Their homeland was in northeast Mesopotamia, in the upper reaches of the Tigris basin. Among their great cities was the fabled Nineveh, which is featured prominently in a great many biblical stories, chief among them in the Book of Jonah.

The Assyrians initially emerged to fill up the power vacuum that arose when the Hittites destroyed the powerful kingdom of Mitanni in northern Mesopotamia, between the upper reaches of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, in the latter part of the second millennium BCE. When the Hittites themselves collapsed at the end of the Bronze Age (circa 1200 BCE), the Assyrians began their inexorable march toward the Mediterranean, destroying or neutralizing any power that stood in their way.

Initially, they were kept in check by the powerful Aramaean kingdom of Damascus, which had organized a powerful coalition to oppose the Assyrians. One of the leaders of the coalition was Ahab, son of Omri, king of Israel (it was this same Ahab who was married to the infamous Jezebel, the Phoenician princess from Tyre). Judging from the Assyrian accounts, which have come down to us, Ahab played a prominent role in this alliance, supplying it with 2,000 chariots and 10,000 men. The coalition met the Assyrians at the Battle of Qarqar in 853 BCE, where the Assyrian expansion was temporarily halted. Unfortunately, the members of the alliance began to fight among themselves, allowing the Assyrians to employ the old tactic of "divida et impera," divide and conquer.

We have plenty of archeological evidence about the relationship Israel and Judah had with the Assyrians. There is hardly a site in both kingdoms that escaped the ravages of the brutal Assyrian war machine. Archeological excavations throughout the past century have borne vivid testimony to this fact.

In what was the northern kingdom of Israel, archeological excavations have, over most of the last century, shown us that the Assyrians destroyed most of the major sites. Places such as the northern capital, Samaria, which was captured by the Assyrians and had its population deported, tell an all-too-familiar story. The same fate befell both Megiddo and Hazor, two other important cities in the northern kingdom of Israel that have been the subject of intense archeological excavations and that have previously been discussed in this column.

Yet archeology indicates that all was not lost, either. Jerusalem increased in size immediately after the fall of the northern kingdom, which some archeologists attribute to an influx of refugees who fled the Assyrian destruction of Israel in the north. This would indicate that not all of the "Lost Tribes" were lost.

Ultimately, however, the Assyrians did descend on Judah, and the swath of destruction they wrought is still quite vivid. Sites such as Lachish, which was excavated by David Ussishkin of Tel Aviv University, were completely demolished, and the horrors inflicted on their defenders can still be seen on the wall reliefs of the Assyrian palace at their capital, Nineveh.

But in the end Judah survived, thanks to the foresight of its king, Hezekiah (who built the so-called Broad Wall, whose remains can still be seen in the Old City) and his adviser, the great prophet Isaiah. As for the Assyrians, they were relegated to the dustbin of the Past, while our ancestors would continue to march Forward into history.

Pen pals around the world

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It seems almost quaint. With the billions of e-mail messages that travel across the world daily, there are still people looking for someone to talk to. People have had pen pals in faraway places since long before the World Wide Web. But the Internet and e-mail have revolutionized pen pals and given an immediacy undreamed of a few years ago. Today, how to make friends around the corner or across the world.

Please note that pen pal sites are meant to be places to strike up long-distance relationships and learn about life in other countries. They are not intended to be dating sites. But you never really know who you are speaking to online, so be prudent about giving out any personal information.

• Hello, my name is Yitzhak. I am from Jerusalem. I am looking to make new friends… I love soccer and I support Manchester United and the Israel national team." [tinyurl.com/penpals05]

• I'm Iris, a high school student from Israel. I love reading, singing, sculpting and any other art-related things… I think you'll find out I'm interesting and fun to talk to, even though in 'real life' I'm quite shy." [tinyurl.com/penpals06]

• And how's this for honesty? "Hi, my name is Yael. im a 19-year-old girl from Israel… i have no idea what i want to do with my life, so im just passing my days working in an annoying job… So i guess what i want is to find something that will take my mind off my reality. [tinyurl.com/penpals08]

Rather than leaving it to kids to find counterparts in Israel, some schools do the work for them through twinning programs. Schools in the Los Angeles area have twinned with counterparts in Tel Aviv and correspond via e-mail, online chats and video-conferencing. They share a joint curriculum and travel to each other's country. [tinyurl.com/isrtwin]

Orly Noy is an Israeli journalist living in Jerusalem. A few years ago, she began a very public "pen friend" relationship with Omneya al-Naggar, an Egyptian schoolteacher from Alexandria. The BBC asked them to converse about daily life, politics, violence and reconciliation. [tinyurl.com/bbcpenpals] The tone is usually quite moderate, however, things do heat up. Noy: "Sometimes I get the feeling that for you, there is no possibility to see or understand even slightly the Israeli side, because that would, somehow, be justifying it. Even when you say you realize that there is violence from the Palestinian side as well, you immediately add, 'But what do you expect when your territory is occupied?', as if the only way to maintain national resistance is to blow up people at buses."

I found the conversation most interesting when it took unexpected turns. At one point, Al-Naggar mentioned that she had visited Auschwitz. That prompted Noy to ask her why. Al-Naggar's response: "Why did I visit Auschwitz? A curious question because it sounds as if I was not supposed to or expected to. I took it for granted that anybody with a minimum desire to understand world history would not miss the chance of visiting such a site."

Two of the most interesting pen pal sites I came across are run by the Aleph Institute [jewishpenpals.org] and by Jewish Prisoner Services International. [tinyurl.com/prispal] One of their goals is to find pen pals for Jewish prisoners. Corresponding with a convict may seem unusual but can have a lasting impact on the lives of those who are isolated and forgotten by most people in the community.

Jewish Prisoner Services has offered a few tips for safe and rewarding pen pal experience:

• Do not use your home address.

• Do not ask why a person is in prison.

• It is acceptable to discuss religion, politics and personal philosophies but don't ever proselytize, evangelize or otherwise pressure a pen pal to "see it your way." [tinyurl.com/36l3v8]

As the Aleph Institute site puts it, "Your opportunity to perform a mitzvah… for the cost of only a postage stamp."

Ramah alum brings informal education to classroom

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Debbie Cohen Savage was working on her master's of education degree at the Jewish Theological Seminary, she based her thesis topic on her own early experiences at summer camp, in youth groups and on Israel trips.

She knew that, at least for her, informal education played an important role in strengthening her commitment to Jewish education as an adult. She didn't know that it was true across the board until she canvassed fellow education students as well as rabbinical and cantorial students at the school.

Today, a decade after starting out as a teacher at Toronto's Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, Cohen Savage incorporates aspects of informal education – music, drama and dance, for example – into her day as a Grade 6 general and Jewish studies teacher.

Her classroom is filled with natural light and decorated in part with striking student artwork resembling that of aboriginal artist Norval Morisseau, in conjunction with a unit of study on aboriginal Canadians. A teepee at the back was made by students out of canvas and bamboo sticks, and is painted with Jewish and native symbols.

A lesson from the teacher: "Just laugh, and smile. There are too many things in life that are difficult. You should come into the classroom and feel safe, and love being there."

Morah Debbie, as students call her, is also the school's Judaic studies co-ordinator and helped develop curriculum that integrates elements of Judaic studies into the general studies curriculum.

With a background in jazz, modern dance, ballet and Israeli dancing, Cohen Savage said she loves to teach Israeli dancing to the school's entire student body for Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Although her passion has always been Judaism and Judaic studies, the 33-year-old Toronto native said that, as a teacher, "it doesn't matter what you're teaching, you have an opportunity to interact with students and see the light go off on their faces when they get passionate about something."

From a Jewish standpoint, she said, "if I can help other students develop a strong Jewish identity, something they're proud of, then I've done my job."

Cohen Savage's classroom style balances a serious approach with her more lighthearted side. "I try to get [students] to constantly question, grapple and struggle with concepts so they can figure things out on their own," she said.

But it's not uncommon for her to break into song to get her students' attention, sometimes using made-up lyrics that are as simple as "One, two, three. Please listen to me."

"I grew up in a singing household," said Cohen Savage, whose mother, Marilyn Cohen, has been a member of the choir at Beth Tikvah Synagogue for more than 40 years.

Her home environment also included "wonderful Shabbat experiences," she said.

Debbie Cohen Savage

Now the mother of a two-year-old boy, Cohen Savage – whose husband Eli Savage teaches at the Toronto Heschel School – is a day school graduate and a veteran of Camp Ramah, where she spent 15 summers and is now a board member.

"I think about camp as an ideal setting for creating Jewish identity," she said. "We can't create a camp at school, because it's a formal setting, but we can create experiences where the kids are having as much fun and meaningful experiences that help shape their Jewish identity."

Lazar Yitzchok Glatt Kosher Meat

On behalf of the Bielak family, we would like to express our sincere appreciation to all our valued customers and friends for their continued patronage. Your support over the years has made Lazar Yitzchok one of the most prominent and well respected kosher companies in the industry.

With regret, we must advise you that we have chosen not to pursue the kosher business at this present time. This has been a very difficult decision for us to make; many of our clients and friends have persistently tried to persuade us to continue in this business. We thought very long and hard, but as a company we have made a decision for the interim to take a different direction. We feel that this direction is the best possible decision for our company for present and future growth.

Lastly, we would like to remind you that all our products bearing the label COR #369 Glatt Kosher have been processed under the strict supervision of the COR, Kashruth Council of Canada. All products bearing COR #369 will be available in the marketplace until inventories have been depleted.

German Muslim beauty queen portrays Anne Frank

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Over the years, the Toronto Jewish community has been presented with countless events that educate people about the Holocaust, but for the first time, a German Muslim beauty queen was the one delivering the message.

Asli Bayram, a German actress and the first Miss Germany of Turkish Muslim descent – a title she won in 2005 – toured Toronto-area schools earlier this month, performing vignettes from Anne Frank: The Diary of a Young Girl.

Asli Bayram

On Nov. 10, Bayram, who first appeared on a German stage as Anne Frank in January, gave her first English performance at the Marshall McLuhan Catholic Secondary School, in front of the entire student body, as well as Max Eisen, a Holocaust survivor who often speaks out about his experience.

Sitting at a small desk in the middle of the school's auditorium stage, dressed from head to toe in black, hair pulled back tight, Bayram, 26, read excerpts from the famous diary that documented Anne Frank's experience living with her family in hiding, before getting caught by the Nazis in 1944 and dying in the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp when she was 15.

Bayram struggled with her first English performance, often stumbling over difficult-to-pronounce words, but her ability to connect with the material was obvious.

The Toronto-area tour, presented by the Te-Amim Music Theatre – a non-profit organization that examines the legacy of the Holocaust through the arts – and sponsored by Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, also gave Bayram a platform to share her own story of racism and intolerance.

Following her performance, she spoke about the most difficult episode of her life.

In 1994, when Bayram was 12 years old, a neo-Nazi, her neighbour in her hometown of Darmstadt, Germany, knocked on her door and began cursing.

As her father came to the door to defuse the situation, he was shot several times by the neighbour – one of the bullets hit Bayram in her arm – and her father bled to death in front of her.

"I never thought it would happen. It was a neighbour, and we always heard bad words from them, like 'you stupid Turks, we will kill you,' but we never took it seriously that someone would come and kill our father. He even said that if it was possible, he would have killed all of us, but my father shut the door, so that kept us alive," Bayram said, adding that it was hard on her family knowing that they lost her father, not due to an accident, but because of hate.

"It was a horrible and sad point in my life, but I didn't give up in believing in hope and justice and I will always fight for that."

Her father's murderer spent only 3-1/2 years in prison, and Bayram believes that racism played a role in his quick release.

She said that all her sisters became lawyers, and Bayram also went to school to study law, but she decided on a career in the arts because she was more passionate about it.

"With the arts, acting, movies and theatre, you can always send a message for justice and human rights, and I love to make this case and send a message to people with projects like the Anne Frank project. This is why I chose to do this," she said.

Bayram said that people often ask her what it is like to play a Jewish girl, being a Muslim, but she doesn't think of it that way. "When I play Anne Frank, I just think of a girl, a human child that was murdered just because she was different from others in Germany. For the message and as a human… this was the most important thing for me," she said.

Joanna Sadowski, 27, says her recent 20-day solo canoe trip through Algonquin Park was both challenging and simple.

Joanna Sadowski

A canoe and yoga instructor with a teaching degree from Australia, Sadowski embarked on her journey in order to raise money for the Cambodian Children's Fund, in partnership with Off the Mat Into the World (OTM), an organization aimed at encouraging yoga enthusiasts to become active in their local and global community.

Sadowski, a graduate of McGill University, said she starting canoeing at summer camp, and came to love the challenge.

"I began taking out trips during the summers between university, and when I graduated, I decided it was something I could do full time. I am at my best when I'm outside."

When she got involved with OTM, she said, she was inspired to help improve the lives of children "who literally have nothing. I thought of running a marathon, but canoeing is my passion, and I thought that people would support me.

"I felt grateful to have the means to go on the trip, and I was excited to be about something other than myself. It's a cool way to combine adventure and charity. We live in abundance here. By tapping into the community, we can help elsewhere."

She is attracted to the simple life, she says. "Of course, there are a number of challenges when embarking on a trip, but it's the simplicity I love. There is no white noise and no electronics, so there is a lot of time for reflection. I am disconnected, but I'm connected to my body and thoughts and to the sounds of nature.

"I also become more grateful for my food, because I have to work for it. Especially in the winter, digging a hole for water has a certain incredible energy attached to it. I become self-reliant."

She had food dropped off on the 10th day of her 20-day trip, she said, and she had a satellite phone that she used twice. "The longest time I went without talking to anyone was six days. When you're by yourself, every step is precious. No one is there if you fall. "

She'd do it again, she said, but she'd have to run it past her family. "I think they found it more challenging than I did. They were proud, but they were perplexed."

Sadowski said she has raised more than $6,000 of the $20,000 she hopes to raise for the charity. For information, e-mail her at josadowski@hotmail.com.

Hillel wants to get beyond tit-for-tat confrontations

By MEYER MECHANIC

Guest Voice

It has become fashionable these days to portray Canada's campuses as perpetually boiling cauldrons of anti-Israel hatred and continuous intimidation of Jewish students. They're seen by some as venues where discussion is impossible and dialogue is synonymous with surrender and fear.

There is no doubt that anti-Israel forces on campus seek to delegitimize Israel and that many of their events brand Jewish students as racist just for supporting Israel. That's deplorable and a violation of student rights. Hillel strongly opposes such extremist tactics and will always advocate vigorously to protect the rights, reputation and safety of students.

To say, however, that the pursuit of shared values, dialogue and outreach with other campus communities does not protect students is drawing a polarized line in the sand, where the only choices are confrontation or submission. That approach is not a prescription for successful advocacy. The reality is that a majority of Jewish students oppose tit-for-tat confrontational tactics, and those who say otherwise are trying to impose their views from the outside on the students within.

I have seen the negative impact of militant, in-your-face advocacy first hand. It was only a few months ago when a mob from a group called Students Against Israeli Apartheid stormed the office of York University president Mahmoud Shoukri.

Ostensibly, the objective of their reprehensible behaviour was to get an audience with Shoukri. In reality, they intended to intimidate him. "Do you really want to discuss the issues with me, or do you really want a photo op?" Shoukri was quoted by the York student newspaper, Excalibur, as asking.

"If you want to meet with me, ask for an appointment," he added.

Surely, those aren't the recommended tactics of those who propose a more aggressive brand of Jewish student advocacy? Such theatrics are best left to our opponents.

Advocacy takes many forms. Often effective advocacy avoids the screaming and counter-screaming that hasn't won either side any favours and has turned students away from both sides. Positive advocacy that illustrates Israel's irrefutable contributions to the world which we live in and that reaches out to other groups attracts many more students. Let's keep in mind that Israel on campus is not just a Jewish issue; it's a campus issue as well.

Hillel's shared outreach and dialogue have encouraged several groups to take a stand with us. Several weeks ago, journalist Yaakov Katz spoke to crowded rooms at various Toronto universities filled with not only Jewish students, but also members of the Iranian Students Association and others about the threat that Iran poses to Israel and the world. A bond is now being formed between Hillel and the Iranian students in order to get Jewish students to participate in their programs as well.

Hillel has also empowered students by providing tools to fight anti-Zionist campus activities through its sponsorship of prominent speakers such as former Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky and Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz and through advocacy education sessions. Our ultimate goal is standing up for Israel, for student rights and for a safe campus where students can, without fear, express their pride in Israel and their Jewishness.

We know that this is the goal of all Jewish student groups. That's why we invite everyone who shares these objectives, whatever their ideology, to work co-operatively to achieve them, understanding that all of us are deeply devoted to Jewish students, to Israel and to the battle against those on campus who threaten us.

FUN IN MONTREAL: ECRUSY Kadima, the middle school arm of United Synagogue Youth, gathered at Shaare Zion Congregation in Montreal for its Fall Kinnus. This year's theme was "Me, Myself, and I." Teens and pre-teens attended from Hamilton, Toronto, Ottawa, and Montreal for three days of Jewish learning, team-building, and fun.

Does Iran have Syria on a short leash?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last week, Associated Press reporter Robert Barr described two meetings that were being held at around the same time, in two capitals. Israeli president Shimon Peres was in London speaking with British Prime Minister Gordon Brown and others, while David Miliband, Brown's foreign secretary, was in Damascus meeting with Syrian President Bashar Assad.

According Barr (Nov. 18), Miliband said there are signs that Syria "is seeking to change its actions," code for a belief that Syria might be willing to drop its support for terrorist groups such as Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah and the state that underwrites them, Iran.

Peres to spoke about Syria. Barr paraphrased a Peres interview on BBC Radio: "Syria cannot expect Israel to withdraw from the Golan Heights while Iran furthers its influence in Lebanon with the help of Syria. Israel is not prepared to tolerate an Iranian presence on its border."

Over the past year, Israel held a series of four Turkish-mediated "indirect" talks with Syria. Both sides have indicated an interest in continuing them. However, as Barr noted, while Israel demands that Syria break its ties with Iran and Hezbollah, the Syrians have just as strongly rejected these demands.

Ha'aretz correspondent Amos Harel reported on a lecture that the head of Israel's military intelligence, Amos Yadlin, delivered on Nov. 17 at Tel Aviv University. Harel wrote: "[Yadlin] said that Syria might make peace with Israel, but only if Israel gives in to all Syria's demands [e.g. full withdrawal from the Golan Heights and a lucrative U.S. package to guarantee the regime's military and financial stability]. He said that even then, Syria would not cut ties with terror groups." One might add that this means not cutting ties with Iran, either.

In her Nov. 18 Globe and Mail column, "What Obama must do to win Israelis' hearts and minds," Shira Herzog also noted that it's "easier for Israel to contemplate leaving the Golan Heights if, as part of a peace deal, Syria breaks its alliance with Iran and support for Hezbollah." However, Herzog sees more flexibility coming from Damascus than Yadlin does. "Syria has signalled that it's prepared to deliver – but only if it can engage directly with Washington in addition to regaining the Golan."

Last July, there were reports that Alon Liel, a former Israeli diplomat who had been involved in unofficial talks with Syrian officials, confirmed that such signals were coming from the Syrian capital. However, since then there have not been any official Syrian statements to back up his assertions.

An answer might be found in something Miliband was quoted as saying: that Syria wants to be "a secular state at the heart of a stable Middle East."

Yet, Miliband appeared to ignore that fact that Assad is in the same predicament as his father, Hafez, was. His minority Alawite group that runs the "secular" state depends, for its very legitimacy, on a rarely reported but extremely important fatwa (religious edict) that an Iranian-born cleric, Musa Sadr delivered to Hafez Assad in 1973. As journalist and Mideast analyst Jim Lederman pointed out in a telephone conversation, "Sadr's fatwa, that the 'Alawis were an authentic part of Shiite Islam,' was the crucial move that enabled Hafez Assad to consolidate his seizure of the presidency."

Lederman continued: "Until that time, the Alawites had been considered by the Sunni majority to be heretics. Under the Syrian constitution, the president must be a Muslim. The Sunnis, under the Muslim Brotherhood, did not accept the fatwa and rose up in rebellion. But that did them little good. When they attempted an insurrection, Assad killed approximately 20,000 of them in the town of Hama in 1982. There has been little challenge since. But were his son, Bashar, to cut ties with Iran, the Iranian mullahs could just as easily lift the legitimacy they granted his father. That is just something too dangerous for Bashar to even contemplate."

Clarification

In the article "Raising a glass to celebrate kosher wine" (CJN, Oct. 30), the brachah (blessing) to be used with fruit was incorrect. It should have been borei pri ha'etz. In addition, the article didn't specify that the laws of shmittah apply only to the Land of Israel.

Correction

In "A unique monument to Canadian Jewish war veterans" (CJN Perspectives, Nov. 6), the menorah depicted in the stained glass window at Montreal's Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre was incorrectly referred to as a chanukiyah. The CJN regrets this editorial error.

Canada-Israel trade up 45% so far in 2008

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Amid all the economic gloom and doom comes a positive piece of news from Israel's economic mission to Canada: trade between the Jewish state and this country has experienced a boom in 2008.

According to Jonathan Levy, the Toronto-based Israeli consul for economic affairs and Israel's trade commissioner to Canada, Israeli exports to Canada rose 45 per cent in the period of January to September of this year, accounting for nearly $828 million (US) in sales and contracts, according to Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics.

Jonathan Levy

For the same period in 2007, Israel's exports to Canada amounted to $580 million (US).

The results "stand out" in contrast to Israel's trade with its "primary" global economic partners, including the United States, India, the United Kingdom and the rest of the European Union, with whom trade has mostly been stagnant in 2008, Levy told The CJN last week.

While Canada's profile as a desirable market for Israeli companies and investors is still somewhat under the radar back home, that's slowly changing, Levy said.

"Trade between Israel and Canada is quite diverse, and doesn't depend on only one sector," he said. "But the majority of [positive trading] change is being conducted in the hi-tech sector."

Levy, whose mission is, in part, to facilitate partnerships between Canadian and Israeli businesses, pointed to two recent announcements by Canadian companies that decided to invest heavily in Israeli tech.

In late October, Research in Motion's (RIM) BlackBerry Partners Fund – a $150-million venture capital fund – announced an $8-million investment in the Israeli firm WorldMate, a developer of mobile software applications.

Around the same time, a joint announcement by Bell Mobility and Solo Mobile trumpeted an investment in Uniper Ltd., an Israeli tech firm that specializes in developing "content access control" software. Uniper's software is intended to help parents limit mobile-phone access to questionable or inappropriate Internet sites that could be browsed by their children.

The two announcements represent just the tip of the iceberg in potential trade between Canada and Israel, Levy said.

Another Israeli tech company, Nexperience, which makes software that allows remote testing of mobile devices, has already had its application adopted by BlackBerry, Levy said.

The hi-tech industry "is an area where there is a chance to really multiply [business] opportunities," he added.

Levy said that although there have been instances of notable Israeli business success in Canada, namely in the telecom industry with companies such as AmDocs, "in Israel, we know we're pioneers in information technologies [such as] firewalls, voice mail, encryption, disk-on-key… but many Canadians aren't aware of them."

He said his office has been working hard "on a very, very lean" budget, to create meetings between Israeli and Canadian companies since he started in his post a little more than a year ago.

Though there are many projects on the go, Levy said it's necessary to take a long-term view of the potential growth in trade between the two countries.

In February, Levy's office will host a major trade show, tentatively called "Banking on Israeli IT."

"Banks and insurance companies all rely on [information technology] and have needs for greater security, encryption protocols and improving the user experience in mobile banking," he said.

"Israel has a strong reputation in this… and there's a lot of virgin territory here for Israeli information technology."

Levy said he anticipates that Canada will send a major delegation to Israel to participate in the country's annual water technology conference, WATEC, scheduled for Nov. 17 to 19, 2009, in Tel Aviv.

Calgary hosts 39th CHW convention

By IRENA KARSHENBAUM
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — The 39th Canadian Hadassah WIZO (CHW) national convention started off with a party.

Young women gathered in Calgary's Hyatt Hotel after the close of Shabbat to meet and greet, then proceeded to the "Chinook Shuk" for a bit of shopping in support of the venerable organization's philanthropic causes. They rounded out the evening with a dessert reception and entertainment from the Heebee-jeebees, the city's well-known a capella quartet. Some of the convention attendees even broke into dance, as one delegate exclaimed, "This is the power of Jewish women!"

But the fun was only a temporary distraction from the serious nature of the convention, held for the first time in Calgary, from Nov. 15 to 18, as the Zionist women's organization's mandate is to raise money for health care, education and women's causes in Israel.

In her outgoing speech, Sandy Martin, the group's first national president to hail from Calgary, talked about the organization's recent accomplishments.

In the summer of 2006 during the Second Lebanon War, the group was the first Canadian Jewish women's organization to launch a national fundraising campaign for Israel's reconstruction effort, she noted.

As well, under her leadership, CHW launched several new fundraising efforts, such as the sustainers' program, requiring an annual lifetime gift of $1,000, and a woman-of-valour program, requiring a minimum contribution of $10,000.

Martin, an active philanthropist in Calgary outside of her work with CHW, also talked about the "feminization of philanthropy," her belief that by 2020, women will be in charge of 60 per cent of household philanthropic decisions.

In the last three years, under Martin's leadership, the organization has undergone a lot of change.

It was rebranded CHW, an acronym for Canadian Hadassah WIZO, which also points to its three priorities: children, health care and women.

But more than just the name has changed. Hadassah Bazaars have slowly disappeared across the country, with Toronto holding its last one just weeks before the convention.

CHW is working hard to try to change with the times, its leaders stress. As was discussed at the convention, increasing its membership is a key goal, and recruitment of young women is seen as critical to its survival.

There were a number of mother-and-daughter and mother and daughter-in-law tandems at the convention, but since it's no longer a given that young Jewish women will join Hadassah, members of the older generation outnumbered young women at the conference.

The second important goal, as it always has been, is fundraising, and CHW is under pressure to come up with creative fundraising platforms, which in the past have centred around shopping.

Despite these challenges, CHW is still committed to its women's Zionist ideals, as it has been for the past 90 years. Its many contributions were recognized earlier this year when it received the prestigious Israel Prize, the Jewish state's highest honour.

CHW's work has supported many programs in Israel. One of the speakers at the convention was Nicole Wurcker, who made aliyah to Israel from France and who, for most of this decade, has been a foster mother to 12 children from poor backgrounds in Hadassim, a youth village supported by Hadassah WIZO.

Wurcker spoke about how she manages her day while taking care of 15 children, three of whom are her own, and about the love she has for her foster kids. Many in the audience were moved to tears by her story.

The convention also saw the installation of Ottawa's Terry Schwarzfeld as new national president.

Firebomber gets 4 years in jail

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish groups say they're satisfied with the four-year prison sentence handed down last week to the man co-accused in the firebombings of two Jewish institutions in 2006 and 2007, and with the judge's recognition that the attacks were not only hate-motivated crimes, but terrorist acts rooted in a radical and violent ideology.

Quebec Court Judge Gilles Cadieux delivered the sentence recommended by the Crown for Azim Ibragimov, 25, who pleaded guilty last April to charges in connection with his throwing a Molotov cocktail at an Outremont yeshiva in September 2006, as well as for setting off an explosive device made from two propane canisters outside the Snowdon YM-YWHA in April 2007 and for writing letters saying the crimes were carried out in the name of the Islamic jihad and threatening further harm.

Ibragimov also pleaded guilty to setting fire to a parked car in the east end of Montreal, a crime apparently not related to the Jewish community.

Ibragimov, who was described in court as a non-practising Muslim and reportedly born in Kazakhstan, has only 10 months of the sentence left to serve. He has been in custody since his arrest in April 2007 and those 19 months behind bars count as double time. He will be under three years' probation when his jail term is completed.

Just how much more time Ibragimov will actually be locked up is unclear. Statutory release is normally granted after two-thirds of a prison term.

Ibragimov's co-accused, Omar Bulphred, who was arrested at the same time and continues to be detained, has pleaded not guilty to these and five other counts. No date has been set for his trial, but he's scheduled to be back in court Dec. 16.

Both B'nai Brith Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress had asked for an exemplary sentence that would send a message that these kind of hate crimes are not tolerated, and they had emphasized the fear the two attacks had provoked throughout the Jewish community.

In an argument that the judge appeared to accept, prosecutor Mario Dufresne said during a pre-sentencing hearing that the crimes aimed to terrorize the Jewish community and that the punishment should reflect the seriousness of the motivation, and not only the material damage.

Ibragimov's lawyer had asked for a suspended sentence plus 240 hours of community service.

The targets were the chassidic Skver community's Toldos Yakov Yosef school, whose entrance was heavily damaged, and the Y's Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre, which was untouched by the explosion. No one was injured in the late-night assaults, but in both instances, people had left the buildings only about half an hour earlier. At the Y, a Passover seder had just concluded.

Judge Cadieux called Ibragimov's crimes "racist and hateful" and said they caused "panic" in the Jewish community.

He was not swayed by Ibragimov's defence that the younger Bulphred was the mastermind and that Ibragimov had naively been lured in by the promise of payment, nor by testimony from a Ukrainian-born ex-girlfriend, who is part Jewish and had lived in Israel, that Ibragimov was not racist or a fanatic.

Ibragimov, who had no criminal record, read a letter of apology in court during the pre-sentencing arguments and asked for a second chance.

Cadieux said Bulphred may have been the instigator, but Ibragimov cannot be considered merely an accessory. It was Ibragimov who threw the firebomb at the school (he was caught on its surveillance camera videotape) and who seven months later, after having plenty of time for reflection, placed the explosive device outside the Y, he ruled.

After the school incident, Ibragimov wrote two letters, which were entered into evidence, that declared: "In the name of Islamic jihad, we claim responsibility for the attack on the Jewish school, and other attacks are being planned against the Zionists. Free our brothers imprisoned in Toronto," an apparent reference to the arrests in the summer of 2006 of 17 suspects allegedly involved in an Islamist terror plot.

Ibragimov's lawyers argued that the letters' content was dictated by Bulphred.

Barak: Hezbollah's rockets can hit Dimona

By SHAHAR ILAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Ehud Barak said Monday that Hezbollah now possesses 42,000 rockets, some of which are capable of striking Ashkelon, Yerucham and Dimona.

He said that the pro-Iranian organization has tripled its strength since the 2006 war in Lebanon.

In a rare speech to the Knesset plenum, Barak defended himself against critics who had called for a massive offensive in the Gaza Strip, saying that Israel would not become hostage to a lone Qassam rocket.

"A Gaza operation will not hasten the return of Gilad Schalit," Barak declared, in reference to the Israel Defence Forces soldier held captive by Hamas for more than two years. Israel would soon need to make tough decisions on the matter. "Those who are calling for conquering Gaza, should state the consequences out loud.

Barak said that he would suggest that those who urge a "one bang and that's all" approach to an IDF onslaught in Gaza "should stop and think. It's been two years since the Second Lebanon War. Before sending soldiers into battle, we must look into the eyes of every mother and father, and say that we did everything, before sending them."

The temporary ceasefire in Gaza allows Israel to prepare better, and affords it greater flexibility of action regarding Iran, Syria and Hezbollah, Barak added. "This is too serious a subject for a political argument."

Drawing a parallel to the Gaza situation, he alluded to the markedly strengthened Hezbollah and asked, "Does anyone truly want to recapture Lebanon?"

We smashed spy network: Iran

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Official Iranian state radio on Monday said that Tehran has dismantled an espionage network that allegedly was linked to Israel's Mossad spy agency.

Jafari said the alleged network was trying to collect information on Iran's nuclear program and the Guards' military operations, as well as details on military and security officials.

He added that equipment belonging to the alleged network was confiscated. He didn't provide more details, including whether arrests were made and who belonged to the network.

Iran last week executed an Iranian businessman convicted of spying on the Islamic Republic's military on behalf of Israel, the judiciary said on Saturday.

Judicial spokesperson Ali Reza Jamshidi says Ali Ashtari was hanged on Nov. 17 after being sentenced to death on June 30 by a revolutionary court in Tehran.

Ashtari, who was in his mid-40s, was a tradesman in electronic merchandise who supplied military, security and defence centres across the country with electronic devices.

Iranian authorities also recently arrested Hossein Derakhshan, a blogger who visited Israel in 2007, upon his arrival in Tehran from Canada. Derakhshan, who also holds Canadian citizenship, admitted to being involved in espionage for Israel, the Iranian news Website Jahan News reported.

Israel urged to move on conversions

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jewish organizations meeting recently in Jerusalem called on the government of Israel to find a solution to a problem that has vexed the Jewish state for some time – the conversions of 300,000 mostly Russian immigrants.

At separate conventions in Israel, the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and the United Jewish Communities (UJC) urged the government to address the issue quickly.

Reuven Tradburks

The resolutions adopted at the two conferences diverged, with JAFI advocating a lenient halachic approach to addressing the problem. Noting that "Diaspora Jewry is concerned about the religious status in Israel of converts from all religious streams" and that the Supreme Court of Israel has recognized conversions from different streams of Judaism, it called for "the establishment of courts of Jewish law which will base themselves on appropriate moderate and tolerant prior halachic decisions to allow the conversion process to move forward."

The resolution adopted by the UJC, an umbrella organization representing hundreds of North American federated communities, affirmed the interest of Israel and the Jewish people to accept into the Jewish faith immigrants who have chosen "to bind their future to that of the Jewish state and the Jewish people."

UJC called upon… "Israel to speedily redress the administrative impediments to timely conversion by assuring that conversion courts are reconstituted, that they process applicants for conversion efficiently and justly and that they are not subverted by those who call into question those conversions."

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto had delegates at the UJC convention and supported its conversion resolution, said Howard English, the federation's vice-president of corporate communication.

He stressed the resolution was narrowly focused on removing roadblocks to conversion and did not take a position on the nature of appropriate conversions. "We believe that when the conversion process is gummed up by administrative barriers, it increases tension within Israeli society and the Diaspora family, increases skepticism of the process, not to mention [the effect on] those seeking conversions."

The federation is not pushing a particular solution to the problem, he said, because "it's a controversial matter. We have a diversity of opinion in the community."

Israel has been wrestling with the issue of who gets to define who is a Jew for some time. The Orthodox rabbinate has controlled the conversion process in Israel since 1948, as well as personal status issues such as marriage, divorce and burial.

That monopoly has been criticized by other streams of Judaism, and in 1998, the Ne'eman Commission attempted to craft a compromise in which Conservative and Reform groups would participate in preparing converts, while the final conversion remained in the hands of Orthodox rabbinic courts. A State Conversion Authority was established to facilitate the process.

That compromise came crashing down earlier this year when a conversion by Rabbi Haim Druckman, who headed the State Conversion Authority, was struck down by the haredi High Rabbinic Court.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, president of Toronto's Vaad Harabonim (Orthodox Council) and a member of the RCA's conversion committee, said last week that the conversion issue remains a divisive and emotional one among Orthodox rabbis.

The disagreement could be described as one between proponents of "raw halachah," which favours strict application of age-old rules, versus a "meta-halachah" approach, which considers also "the nature of the Jewish state and the enormity of the challenge of having hundreds of thousands of Russian non-Jews" in Israel. Rabbi Druckman and others in the Orthodox camp take the more lenient meta-halachic view. Other non-haredi Orthodox rabbis believe "the problem doesn't have a neat solution," Rabbi Tradburks said.

Rabbi Wayne Allen, spiritual leader of the Conservative Beth Tikvah Synagogue, said "the content of the resolutions are all laudable. The goals are certainly worthy, but in the end as long as it's possible for a small group of haredi rabbis to hijack control of life cycle events in Israel, any new convert to Judaism will still remain with a nebulous status. Their status will still be subject to question at some future time" when they attempt to marry, divorce or are buried, he said.

"What is required is not a procedural solution but an overhaul of the entire system" away from those who would make it "exclusivist," he added.

Israel won't attend Durban II

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel will not participate in the Durban II anti-racism conference, Tzipi Livni said.

Israel's foreign minister made the announcement during an address last Wednesday to the General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities of North America.

The Durban Review Conference scheduled for Geneva in 2009 is a followup to the World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance held in Durban in September 2001. The Durban I conference degenerated into a forum attacking Israel and called Zionism a form of racism.

"During recent months, we expressed the hope that the language of hatred will not repeat itself – we declared that we will not agree to the singling out of Israel, and we will object to incitement and condemnation of Israel," Livni said.

"Despite our efforts and those of friendly countries, for whose position we are grateful, the conference appears to be heading once again towards becoming an anti-Israeli tribunal, which has nothing to do with fighting racism.

"In view of this situation, Israel will not participate and will not legitimize the Review Conference, which will be used as a platform for further anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic activity. We call upon the international community not to participate in a conference which seeks to legitimize hatred and extremism under the banner of the 'fight against racism.'"

The Jerusalem-based watchdog NGO Monitor praised the Israeli government's decision not to participate, saying it "sets an important benchmark."

"It is now clear that any government or NGO that provides greater legitimacy to this destructive farce also contributes to the destruction of universal human rights and to rising anti-Semitism through the singling out of Israel," said Gerald Steinberg, the group's executive director.

"Canada is right not to flinch from standing up to this behaviour and the general unwillingness to call a spade a spade," she said.

Bayefsky noted the General Assembly directs only three resolutions at international human rights violators, including Iran, Myanmar and North Korea, while around 20 condemn Israel.

Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch, said prior to the vote that passage of the resolution was not assured.

Iran is "politicking hard," trading favours for votes. "That's how the UN works," he said.

Still, Iran faced an uphill battle, with its pursuit of an "outlaw" nuclear program weighing against it, Neuer said.

Iran's strategy appeared, in part, to go on the offensive. According to Iran's FARS news agency, the Mideast state recently released a book titled Human Rights Violation by Canada, as well as a 70-page booklet that accused Canada of "routine unlawful strip [sic] and beatings by Canadian police."

Iran's foreign minister is quoted in the Tehran Times' website accusing Canada of "falling into trap of [the] Tel Aviv regime… Canada is following Tel Aviv lead in [a] propaganda campaign against Iran."

Another Iranian news item quotes the foreign ministry, saying, "Canada's anti-Iran resolution was issued in line with the failed policies of Washington and Israel." Meanwhile, a source from Iran's Foreign Ministry told the official IRNA news agency that the Canadian-sponsored UN resolution could deprive that country of chances for "fair" ties with the Islamic Republic.

In other developments, Ha'aretz reported that Hossein Derakhshan, a Farsi-language blogger who visited Israel in 2007, was recently arrested in Tehran. The blogger, who holds Iranian and Canadian citizenship, admitted to being involved in espionage for Israel, according to Jahan News, which is believed to be affiliated with the Iranian intelligence community.

In 2003, Iranian-Canadian photojournalist Zahra Kazemi died after spending three weeks in Iranian custody. She was arrested for taking photographs of a student protest in Tehran.

Rubashkin denied bail

By AMI EDEN
JTA

POSTVILLE, Iowa — A U.S. federal magistrate judge has denied bail for the former manager of a kosher slaughterhouse in Iowa who was arrested last week for the second time in two months.

Judge Jon Scoles ruled Nov. 20 that Sholom Rubashkin – whose family owned Agriprocessors, which was once America's largest kosher meatpacking plant – posed a flight risk and would be held until trial. Scoles wasn't persuaded by Rubashkin's willingness to post a more than $3-million bond, the bulk of it guaranteed by Jewish residents of Postville who were willing to put up their home equity as a guarantee, the Iowa Independent reported.

Prosecutors said in a Nov. 19 hearing that a travel bag packed with passports and $20,000 in cash and silver coins was found in Rubashkin's home. Rubashkin's attorneys said he was deeply connected to his family and the Postville community, and posed no risk of flight.

Rubashkin was arrested last week and charged with orchestrating an accounting scheme that enabled Agriprocessors to borrow more money than it had collateral to cover. At the time of his arrest, Rubashkin was free on another bond resulting from his arrest in late October on charges related to document fraud and the harbouring of illegal aliens.

Agriprocessors was the target of a massive federal immigration raid in May. On Nov. 4, the company filed for bankruptcy protections, throwing the U.S. kosher meat supply into crisis.

Rocket hits Ashkelon

A rocket from Gaza hit Ashkelon's industrial zone last Friday. No one was injured. Rockets from Gaza have increased in range in recent months, reaching beyond Sderot on the Gaza border. A recent intensification of attacks tapered off last week after Israel shut access to Gaza to get its Hamas rulers to enforce a ceasefire.

Israel lets in aid

Israel let humanitarian aid into Gaza and resumed pumping in diesel fuel. The decision to allow 44 trucks carrying supplies, including food and medicine, to enter Gaza was made Monday after defence officials agreed Israel would ease the blockade in the wake of Hamas' announcement there would no new rocket attacks, Ha'aretz reported. Israel also began pumping diesel fuel into Gaza on Monday. The Palestinians claim the three-week break in supplies of diesel fuel to Gaza's power plant caused widespread blackouts.

Prisoners to be freed

Israel will free 250 Palestinian prisoners next month in a gesture to coincide with a Muslim holiday, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert promised PA President Mahmoud Abbas last week. The prisoners will be aligned with Abbas' Fatah group and will have to sign a pledge not to return to terror.

Ya'alon quote explained

An aide to Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon denied that the former Israeli army chief of staff said Israel should consider killing Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, saying the comment was taken out of context. Ya'alon was quoted in Monday's Sydney Morning Herald as saying about Iran's president, "We have to consider killing him. All options must be considered." – With files from JTA

Dutch novelist and essayist was a high school dropout

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For a guy who dropped out of high school at the age of 17, Arnon Grunberg has fared remarkably well. Twenty years on, Grunberg, Holland's literary wunderkind, is a successful author, with 20 books, including 10 novels, to his credit.

Nonetheless, Grunberg, 37, is not exactly a household name outside Holland, even though five of his novels have been translated into English and published in the United States, where he has lived for the past 13 years.

His latest work in English, The Jewish Messiah (Penguin Press), is vintage Grunberg. A biting satire with a grim twist about a quirky Swiss teenager whose grandfather was a Nazi stormtrooper and who converts to Judaism and settles in Israel, Grunberg's novel is much like his previous works, brimming with over-the-top characters, absurd situations, unusual dialogue, bizarre relationships and self-deprecating humour.

"You see humour even in tragic circumstances," said Grunberg, who was in Toronto recently as a guest of the International Festival of Authors. "Humour is a tool of the powerless."

As improbable as The Jewish Messiah's theme may be, it is rooted in reality. When Grunberg was a young man growing up in Amsterdam, his birthplace, he met the son of an Austrian Nazi who immigrated to Israel, returned to Holland in despair and committed suicide. The incident begs a question: Are Grunberg's novels – from The Story of My Baldness to The Asylum Seeker – autobiographical?

Grunberg, a personable fellow, said that only two of his novels, Blue Monday, his first, and Silent Extras, his second, are actually based on his own life.

Blue Mondays – a bestseller that sold nearly 200,000 copies and made him virtually financially secure – is a tragicomedy about the dark underbelly of escort services in which a young man who's expelled from school roams Amsterdam in search of kicks and discovers that sex is cheap and love is elusive.

In Silent Extras, a farce turning on fantasy, failure and the absurdity of ambition, Grunberg's protagonist, a wannabe actor, responds to the siren call of Hollywood, only to find that he has embarked on a hilarious, humiliating and futile quest.

Arnon Grunberg

In fact, Grunberg left school to become an actor. His parents were naturally disappointed, having hoped that he would enter the professions. Grunberg would not listen to them. "There was something appealing about the stage," he explained. "My shyness faded away in acting and empowered me."

Grunberg, having been rejected by acting schools in Amsterdam, found minor roles in several forgettable Dutch movies. But soon enough, he learned that he had no future as an actor. "It would not bring me anything," he said.

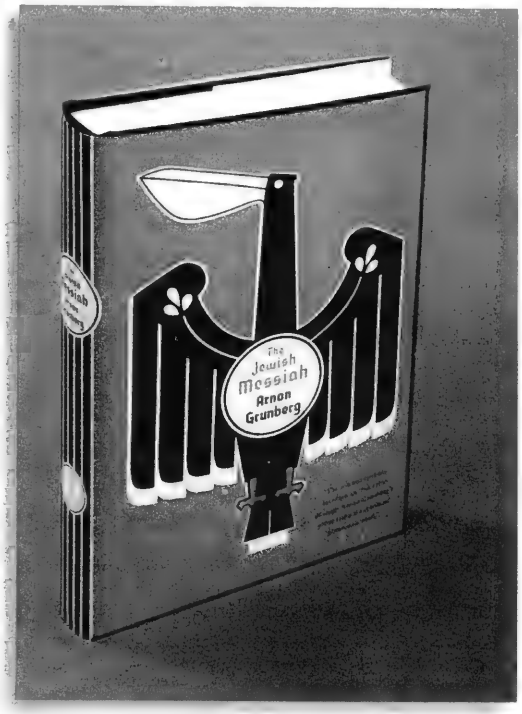
He next worked as a clerk for a telephone-book publishing company. The boss, a kind man who took a liking to him, fired Grunberg, telling him that he was destined for greater things. In 1990, when he was all but 19, he founded a publishing company. "Working with books came naturally to me," he said.

Grunberg published five books, German works in Dutch, but no one bought them, and he went bankrupt. "I guess I wasn't a good businessman," he said.

At the suggestion of a man who considered buying his company, Grunberg wrote Blue Mondays, which won a prestigious Dutch prize for the best debut novel. He was only 23. (In 2000, under a pseudonym, he garnered that award yet again for The Story of My Baldness, which is about a clumsy 14-year-old boy who seeks love.)

Blue Mondays' success thrilled him. "If I had failed, I might have become a shoemaker," he said. "In writing, I finally found something I enjoyed doing."

Grunberg's latest novel, Our Uncle, which is set in South America and draws inspiration from the "dirty war" in Argentina during the 1970s and 1980s, has just been published in Holland.



Apart from his novels, which have been well received by critics and readers alike, Grunberg, an incessant traveller, has also written 10 books containing his journalistic pieces and essays. In addition to articles on the Israeli army and the current wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, he has produced essays on culture, particularly on authors he admires such as Isaac Babel and Primo Levi.

His travels are of great value to him as a novelist. "My trips put me into situations I might otherwise never experience," he noted.

Grunberg, a bachelor with a girlfriend in Holland, is a self-professed workaholic. "I like to work. It's important to continue working. If I had a wife and kids, I wouldn't be prolific."

Raised in a Jewish neighbourhood in Amsterdam, he is the son of German Jews who settled in Holland after the Nazis rose to power in 1933.

His father, a stamp dealer, survived the German occupation of Holland by masquerading as a German army deserter, while his mother, a passenger on the St. Louis, a ship full of European Jewish refugees turned away by a succession of countries in the late 1930s, was incarcerated in a series of concentration camps ranging from Westerbork to Auschwitz (where her parents were murdered).

Grunberg's mother and father never felt completely at home in Holland, and neither does he. "I feel disconnected from Holland," said Grunberg, a secular Jew who followed a girlfriend to New York City in 1995 and stayed after their relationship broke up. Nevertheless, Grunberg visits Holland three or four times a year, teaching literature at the University of Leiden.

His older sister, Maniou, a mother of seven, made aliyah in 1982 and lives in a religious settlement in the West Bank. Although he believes that Israel is a necessity, he does not think that Israel is "the only place for Jews."

As far as he can tell, Israel's image in Holland has improved since the rise of Islamic radicalism in the Netherlands.

"Jews are very integrated into Dutch society, except for ultra-Orthodox Jews," observed Grunberg, who has never personally felt anti-Semitism in Holland. "Jews are assimilated and totally accepted."

Books covered in prisoners' cloth: the Holocaust and creative response

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

The recent appearance of the film adaptation of the young adult novel The Boy in the Striped Pajamas has re-energized longstanding discussions about how the Holocaust should be represented in art. John Boyne's 2006 novel was an international success, and the film's Disney-backed promotion invites comparison with Roberto Benigni's Life is Beautiful, in which dire wartime events are viewed from a child's perspective.

Norman Ravvin

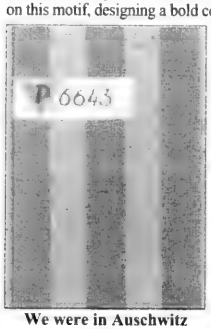
In Benigni's film the conceit, which did not satisfy all viewers, was the notion that a father could succeed not only at keeping his child hidden from danger in a concentration camp, but that this effort could be turned into a game of hide and seek.

The conceit underlying The Boy in the Striped Pajamas is equally unrealistic: a German boy, the son of a Nazi death camp commandant, is taken to live outside the camp's perimeter. From the safe side of the camp's barbed wire he encounters a prisoner who is a Jewish boy from Krakow.

The two children become friends, and their relationship leads to a conclusion that has nothing to do with the experience of being a child on either side of German barbed wire on the Polish countryside.

Both the book and the film aim at a surprising perspective from which to view the Holocaust. Each makes use of the fable form, familiar to young readers. And both film and book make use of a trick found in fairy tales and advertisements – the notion that children placed outside their parents' world of nastiness and victimization will create a more humane alternate existence for themselves.

The striped pajamas motif is central to Boyne's creation, since Bruno, the German youth, gazes at camp inmates from a distance, imagining he is looking at a farm where the workers wear the curious striped gear as their uniform. Boyne's publisher picked up on this motif, designing a bold cover for the novel that makes use of horizontal dark and light grey strips suggestive of concentration camp uniforms.



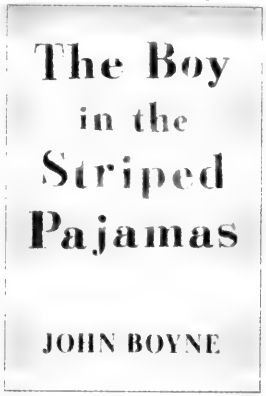
We were in Auschwitz

The publisher of The Boy in the Striped Pajamas is likely unaware of the startling first edition of the postwar publication We Were in Auschwitz, whose authors, Tadeusz Borowski, Janusz Nel Siedlecki and Krystyn Olszewski included their camp tattoo numbers in their authors' attribution. The book's first imprint was bound in covers cut from the material of the author's camp uniforms, and the cover of a recent reprint of We Were in Auschwitz maintains a historical replica of the vertical grey stripes of the prisoners' uniform.

The horizontal stripes on the cover of The Boy in the Striped Pajamas are evocative of the book's overall nonsensical approach to the war, which the film promotes. If one is dealing with children, Boyne seems to suggest, as did Benigni in Life is Beautiful, just about anything that feels good in the end goes.

All of this should not suggest, however, that creative, even surprising ways of understanding the war should be under prohibition. An instructive book on Holocaust-related themes is Fyodor Dostoyevsky's The House of the Dead, based on his four-year incarceration in a Czarist Siberian prison camp during the 1850s. Dostoyevsky, a nobleman and intellectual, was thrown into the criminal's milieu for his political meetings with anti-Czarist activists. But there are key aspects of his experience that help us understand the forces in European society that made gulags, concentration camps and death camps a signal element of twentieth-century European society.

Like the Germans, the Russian government placed its camps in remote landscapes, choosing Siberia as the place where only the fringes of Russian society would interact with the condemned. Like the Nazi camps (and here we find a motif key to The Boy in the Striped Pajamas) relatively normal life continued on the other side of the prison fence. On this theme, Dostoyevsky's narrator reminds us of Primo Levi, both in tone and content as he considers his predicament:



"Beyond the gate was the bright world of freedom where people lived like everyone else. But to those on this side of the enclosure that world seemed like some unattainable fairyland. Here was our own world, unlike anything else; here were our own laws, our own dress, our own manners and customs, here was the house of the living dead, a life like none other upon earth, and people who were special, set apart."

The convicts in Czarist prisons were branded on their forehead, slept 30 to a plankwood bunk, and experienced a kind of international community made up of Russians, Poles and a range of tribesmen from the vast Caucasus. A lively economy existed in goods smuggled from outside, and the convicts were able to peddle their skills to the country people outside the prison. Primo Levi's essay on such black-marketeering between inmates of Auschwitz and Poles and Germans outside the camp is one of the most compelling chapters of his young man's memoir, Survival in Auschwitz.

Like Elie Wiesel, Dostoyevsky's narrator is drawn to inmates who maintain their belief and a kind of saintliness in spite of prison life. Wiesel's saintly men are rabbis, while Dostoyevksy studies, in one case, an "Old Believer" of the Russian Orthodox Church: "He was a little, grey-haired man of about 60. From the first time I set eyes on him he made a strong impression on me. He was so unlike the other convicts: there was something so calm and peaceful in his gaze that I remember I used to look with particular satisfaction at his clear, bright eyes, which were surrounded by fine, radiant wrinkles. I often used to talk to him, and in all my life I have seldom encountered such a good-hearted and kindly person."

Of course there are fundamental differences between the Czarist prisons, which were not in any way extermination centres, and the German idea of the concentration camp. The point of the Russian version was punishment, incarceration, debasement, and in the most extreme cases, the breaking of a particularly violent repeat offender. The Czarist ideal was not to create a population of untermenschen or slaves. Dostoyevesky does, however, point to the phenomenon of men being transformed into a version of what the Germans' victims called musselmen, those who lost themselves entirely, or were "drowned," as Levi put it.

Reading The House of the Dead in relation to Holocaust history reveals how widely and idiosyncratically one can search in order to find instructive contexts and analogies for understanding the Nazi victimization of the Jews. The most effective outcomes are often drawn from comparisons that don't necessarily search for sameness, but for a thickly textured sense of historical patterns. The wrong-way stripes on the cover of The Boy in the Striped Pajamas are evocative of the opposite outcome, where specificity and knowledge are jettisoned in favour of sentiment and the search for a newfangled approach to difficult material.

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

The dazzling transformation of the Art Gallery of Ontario is both a personal and professional achievement for world-renowned architect Frank Gehry.

"It's a great pleasure to come home to a place I knew as a child," said Gehry, who was born in Toronto in 1929 and is now based in Los Angeles. He was in town for the recent reopening of the gallery.

It was more than 70 years ago that Gehry first visited the gallery and experienced the art there.

The AGO's new Thomson collection includes 130 historical ship models, from the Napoleonic era to the 20th century, which are displayed in Gehry's newly designed wave-shaped cases. The ship models are part of the 2,000 Canadian and European paintings and objects donated to the AGO by the late billionaire Ken Thomson.

"My fantasy is that kids will come to this museum, see the ships and get involved in something else – that's what happened to me when I was eight years old," Gehry said, speaking in the gallery's historic Walker Court, which he redesigned with a glass roof.

Gehry, who began the $276-million transformation project more than six years ago, spent two years designing galleries to house the Thomson collection of 700 Canadian works, including paintings by Tom Thomson and Lawren Harris, and 900 European works. All 2,000 pieces of the collection were hung or arranged by David, Thomson's son.

Frank Gehry

At liberty to redesign almost any space in the AGO, Gehry decided not to change the European Gallery, because as a child he remembered it to be perfect and childhood memories are important to him.

"The one thing that bothered me when I came to the AGO before we did this, is you'd walk in the door and you were confused where you were going," he said.

"As a kid, I remember Walker Court and coming right in – there wasn't the DNA in this building to have an entry to this courtyard, so I thought it was important to re-establish that with the new building."

Once you enter the building, a curved, serpentine-shaped ramp draws you to Walker Court, at the heart of the AGO. "Hopefully, that'll lead to clarity when you come in – you'll know where you are and where to go," Gehry said.

Visitors can experience the Vivian and David Campbell Centre for Contemporary Art by taking the Allan Slaight and Emmanuelle Gattuso soaring staircase off Walker Court. The contemporary gallery's 200 works, arranged chronologically from the 1960s to the present, include art by Toronto's Kent Monkman, Robert Rauschenberg and Montreal artist Betty Goodwin, whose work expresses mourning and loss.

To connect the galleries, Gehry designed a spiral stairway at the south side of the building. The stairway has a glassed-in tower that allows visitors to reconnect with the city and then go back into the galleries, said Craig Webb, an architect who worked with Gehry on the redesign.

"Seeing daylight gives you a different sense of what the art is about and relieves gallery fatigue," Webb said.

Similarly, Gehry's glass-and-wood-structured sculpture gallery, the Galleria Italia, extends 450 feet along the north side of the building, allowing visitors to look out and enticing passersby to come in.

"I know for me having grown up here, I can see how important the AGO is for Toronto in the future," Gehry said.

"This collection that showcases our Canadian heritage in a special way is bound to bring new attention on the subject and a sense of pride if you're Canadian. People are going to come from far and wide to see it."

Former Degrassi actor plays the prince in Cinderella

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Gemini Award-winning Degrassi actor Jake Epstein has the role of the prince in Ross Petty's latest holiday musical.

The show, titled Cinderella: The Sillyicious Family Musical, is on at Toronto's Elgin Theatre from Nov. 28 to Jan. 4, 2009.

"What Ross Petty does, is he takes well-known fairy tales and puts a spin on them. He makes them fun by having us sing modern pop songs. It is a pantomime that comes from English tradition. It is pure entertainment," Epstein, 21, says.

"As much as I'd like to think my character Prince George is charming – he's not so good with girls and he's trying to get away from being a prince. He's a musician trying to live out his dream of music, but his father has put all this pressure on him to find a wife.

"I will be playing guitar and singing some awesome tunes, which is cool," says Epstein, a multi-instrumentalist who modestly calls himself an actor who loves music.

In fact, he has been in a number of bands, he says, just for fun – singing, drumming and playing harmonica and guitar. His latest band is called Funkasaurus Rex. Last summer, he recorded a folk album called Disposable World – it is pending release. In his spare time, he plays at clubs in Toronto, solo and with friends.

A National Theatre School graduate, Epstein is best known for his role as Craig Manning in Degrassi: The Next Generation. He even played guitar on the show. Although he left his regular lead role in the show to attend theatre school in Montreal, he still appears on the series from time to time.

Coincidentally, Paula Brancati, who plays the title role of Cinderella, happens to be a current member of the Degrassi cast. She plays Jane Vaughan on Degrassi.

For Degrassi, Epstein received the 2003 Gemini Award for Best Performance in a Children's or Youth Program series and was nominated again the next year. Also, in 2003, Epstein was nominated for a Young Artist Award for Best Ensemble Actor in a TV Series for Degrassi.

In August 2007, Jake travelled to Africa with five of his Degrassi cast mates to build a school in Kenya with the organization Free The Children. A documentary about the trip aired on MTV in Canada in 2007.

"It was phenomenal," says Epstein. "It was a pretty eye-opening, interesting and painful experience. There was a whole combination of feelings that came with being there. I went there expecting rural, poverty-stricken Africa, and while poverty is certainly a huge issue, I found that the people there were so strong and so filled with life – probably more so than in North America.

"I had never done anything like that before – going there was a last-minute decision. I was literally hanging out with some people from the cast and someone just said you should go to Kenya. The cool thing about Free the Children is that they do these amazing trips and their purpose, of course, is to go there and build a school, meet the kids and learn about the culture, but it is also to be an advocate for it when you go back home."

The actor grew up in North York. His mother is Kathy Kacer, the author of Gabi's Dresser; his father, Ian Epstein, is a lawyer; and his sister, Gabi Epstein, is an actress and singer who recently received rave reviews in the play Edges at the Revival Bar on College Street in Toronto.

Since moving back to Toronto from Montreal, Epstein has taken up residence in an apartment downtown, albeit for just a short time – he has a dream of living and working in both New York and Los Angeles. He hopes to test the American waters right after Cinderella's run.

Neil Diamond 'succeeded' beyond his wildest expectations

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

Singer/songwriter Neil Diamond is proud of his latest accomplishments: The 67-year old grandfather of three boys is the oldest artist both to headline a North American tour of arena shows, and to have a CD debut at No. 1 on the music charts.

Diamond has been on a whirlwind, 45-city tour since Home Before Dark, released last May, debuted at No. 1 on the Billboard 200 album chart.

He will be in Toronto on Dec. 2 and 3, performing at Air Canada Centre, and in Ottawa on Nov. 30, at ScotiaBank Place. He played Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver and Winnipeg in September.

Diamond's career seems to go on forever. He has sold 120 million records in 45 years, yet he seems to be humble enough to avoid the excesses of stardom. His new CD has generated many positive reviews of his new songs.

"I am grateful that, after all these years, people resonate with my songs. I try to be honest and truthful in everything I do, just the same as when I was struggling in the 1960s. But for me, it is not the fame or money that moves me – it is the challenge of expressing myself in new songs," said Diamond in a phone interview.

Nearly 40,000 fans will stand up and cheer to Diamond's songs when he comes to Air Canada Centre. Many fans will fondly remember Diamond starring in the 1980 film The Jazz Singer, a remake of the tale of a cantor who found fame as a pop singer.

Diamond's current tour will feature Jazz Singer songs such as Love on the Rocks and America.

Although he didn't receive critical acclaim for his acting in the film, the soundtrack of the movie includes the bestselling songs of Diamond's career.

"The Jazz Singer is memorable as my first movie. I worked very hard to retell this classic story of a Jewish cantor who left his expected place in society for a world in show business. I loved the retelling of the Jewish experience. So much of the story reminds me of my grandparents and their kind of life. They were immigrants to America and taught Yiddish to me as a child," he said.

"I wanted Yiddish in this movie. In fact, I tried to convince the director at one point to have the whole opening in Yiddish with subtitles as they did [with Italian] in The Godfather. Yiddish is a beautiful language, and I wanted to do my bit to keep it alive."

Diamond's first language at home was Yiddish, taught to him by his grandmother.

Born in Brooklyn in 1941 to Akeeba and Rose Diamond, young Neil knew he wanted a career in music, but to satisfy his father's wishes, he enrolled as a pre-med student at New York University, on a fencing scholarship.

After taking his first job as a songwriter for $50 a week in 1961, Diamond was hooked on a music career. He married his high school sweetheart, Jewish schoolteacher Jaye Posner, in 1963. Divorced in 1969, they have two daughters, Marjorie and Elyn.

Like his character Jess Robbins in The Jazz Singer, who found more success with the gentile girl in show business than his wife, Diamond courted Marcia Murphy, a production assistant at ABC Television and married her in 1969. Diamond's marriage with Murphy lasted 25 years, and they had two sons, Jesse and Michah.

"Marcia was my rock. I looked up to her as my source of inspiration. I honestly blame myself for the breakup of our marriage – and my marriage to Jaye, as well. The career I have, of making music, travelling on the road, and all the time I need to be in the studio, takes a toll on a marriage," he said.

In support of Chabad, Diamond sang America at the 2002 L'Chaim To Life Telethon, and he supported Hebrew University at a 2003 dinner in honour of Barbra Streisand, where he sang You Don't Bring Me Flowers with Streisand.

Although Diamond is ambivalent about organized religion, he eagerly embraces Jewishness and raises funds for organizations he admires. "I am Jewish. I believe in God, love the traditions I learned growing up, and tend to be very spiritual, so I want to give back to organizations that reflect my beliefs," he said.

Diamond was inducted into the Songwriters Hall of Fame in 1995. "I've succeeded beyond my wildest expectations. My goal was to exist as a musician, and when your songs work, it tells you that you, too, are worthwhile.

"But when the tour is over, I want to go back home and spoil my grandchildren," he said.

TORONTO POET JACOB SCHEIER WINS GOVERNOR GENERAL'S AWARD

If there's a heaven, Toronto poet Libby Scheier – who died eight years ago at age 54 – must surely be looking down from there now, her heart bursting with motherly pride. Her only child, 28-year-old Jacob Scheier of Toronto, last week won the Governor General's Award for poetry for his debut collection, More To Keep Us Warm.

ECW Press describes the poems as a series of investigations instigated and informed by the death of a young man's mother. "[T]he realities of romantic failures become inextricably connected, and in the process More To Keep Us Warm maps the limitations and breaking points, of the human heart."

A talented writer cut down in her prime, Libby Scheier ran the Toronto Writers Workshop, taught creative writing at York University, and wrote Kaddish For My Father after her father died in 1995. How wonderful that her son has now won a coveted poetry prize. More To Keep Us Warm is available in stores and online for $16.95.

Benefit Concert: London-based singer-songwriter Yoav, whose debut album Charmed and Strange was released only several months ago, is soon to perform a benefit concert in Toronto for the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation. The Israeli-born artist fuses elements of hip hop, electronic music and drum and bass together in unique ways: for example, he uses the body of his guitar to generate rhythms that he loops and manipulates to imitate a keyboard. $20. Einstein's Gift: Holy Blossom Temple Stagecraft Company presents Einstein's Gift, Vern Thiessen's award-winning drama about the controversial German-Jewish scientist Fritz Haber, who converted to Christianity to advance his career.

Haber won the Nobel Prize for chemistry in 1919 for his discovery of nitrogen fixation, a process that led to the mass production of fertilizers that ultimately saved millions from starving. In 1933, the Nazis forced Haber from his post for refusing to fire Jewish colleagues, and he died in Switzerland in 1934. His story is told through the eyes of his longtime friend Albert Einstein.

Thiessen won the Governor General's Award for drama in 2003. While the play has been staged in Edmonton, Vancouver and Winnipeg, this is the first production in the Toronto area. The cast features Ron Boyd, Susanne Egier, Harry Hochman, Judy Kent, Eric Kirsh, Neil Naft, Seann Murray and Rob Schock. Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St. $18, $12. Thursday, Dec. 11, and Saturday, Dec. 13 at 7:30 p.m., and Sunday, Dec. 14, 2 p.m. 416-789-3291, ext 511

Recently in Print: Keeping Hannah Waiting, a novel by New York writer Dave Clarke, tells the story of Kate McBride, who after her mother's passing discovers a Chagall masterpiece worth $50 million in the attic of her childhood home. Deciding to explore the world beyond the Brooklyn bake shop where she works, she visits a Holocaust memorial in Germany and stumbles onto a clue about the painting that leads her to uncover the epic romance that inspired it. Published by Hologram. Available through Amazon.com.

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Conservative Party adopted a resolution at its policy convention in Winnipeg last week that would nullify application of the federal human rights provision that restricts free speech.

The one-paragraph resolution was adopted with broad support of delegates, including Justice Minister and Attorney General Rob Nicholson.

The resolution affirms the Conservative Party's support for "legislation to remove authority from the Canadian Human Rights Commission and Tribunal to regulate, receive, investigate or adjudicate complaints related to Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act."

The section has come under fire in recent months for permitting encroachments on the Charter right to free speech in the name of preventing the promotion of hatred or contempt. Cases involving commentator Mark Steyn writing in Maclean's magazine along with the Western Standard and its publisher, Ezra Levant, brought the provision under intense scrutiny.

Critics such as Levant said the section permitted bureaucratic censorship of free expression while proponents – including three mainstream Jewish advocacy organizations – argued the section was needed to prevent the vilification of minorities. While maintaining their support for the legislation, Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada and the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) have acknowledged the need for procedural reforms to prevent abuse of the section.

Last week, Levant and the Jewish groups again found themselves on opposite sides, this time on their evaluation of the significance of the Tories' resolution.

Levant called passage of the resolution "enormous. It was 90 per cent in favour of repealing section 13 in the workshop but over 99 per cent in the policy plenary, which means Canadians from across the spectrum… voted for this.

"When the justice minister publicly announces that he wants to repeal the law, that's incredible."

Farber said there is also no evidence the Liberals, NDP or Bloc Québécois endorse changes to the Canadian Human Rights Act and in a minority parliament, "there's no stomach to take it on."

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for FSWC, agreed passage of the resolution "does not necessarily mean it's going to end up Canadian government policy."

Despite flaws in the legislation, "At a fundamental point, if you look at the cases where Section 13 [was applied], it's very clear they do constitute hate speech," he said.

FSWC is "in the process of re-evaluating the issue, because there have been problems identified within these types of proceedings," but he added FSWC along with B'nai Brith and Congress are intervenors in a recent human rights case against Marc Lemire, who is alleged to have posted hate messages online. The Jewish organizations have filed joint legal arguments in support of the constitutionality of the section, which Lemire is challenging.

The Lemire case has further discredited the Canadian Human Rights Commission, Levant asserted. Evidence at the hearing showed Commission staff went online to join neo-Nazi organizations where they posted hundreds of bigoted messages.

"The CHRC is a leading disseminator of anti-Semitic, anti-black and anti-gay bigotry in Canada. In fact, I believe they're the largest, and certainly the best-staffed and best-funded, hate group in Canada," Levant said.

"It's hard to believe, I know. I only found out about it because the CHRC had admitted to it under oath.

"In various Section 13 cases, CHRC employees and ex-employees have testified that they joined neo-Nazi organizations, like the U.S.-based Stormfront and Vanguard."

Levant said the Tories would find support in all political parties for a move to rescind Section 13. Canadians from all ends of the political spectrum – including most Jews – would back such a move, he said.

Drycleaner marks 80 years of being Careful

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Brian Chelsky was only 10 years old when he began his career in the dry cleaning business.

"I would make shirt boxes," he recalls.

"I can still remember all of the paper cuts I used to get from that."

Today, Chelsky is president of Careful Hand Laundry & Dry Cleaners, which will be celebrating its 80th birthday next year.

Founded in 1929 by brothers Alex and Jack Shindman – Brian's grandfather and great uncle, respectively – the company set the tone early on as a hands-on service provider that hand-ironed all shirts, linens and valet items for its customers.

"From the very beginning, my grandfather and great-uncle found a niche," says Chelsky, 46.

"The owners of Careful have always worked directly in the business, so they know exactly what the customers need. That's been very important to us, and one of the key reasons for our longevity."

Over time, Careful has grown significantly. Beginning at 152 Avenue Rd., it ended up purchasing the building next door and later acquired a dry cleaning plant in the city's west end.

When you walk through any of Careful's four locations, you get a strong sense of this growth, with historic pictures from the 1940s of employees' hand-ironing garments.

In 2004, the American Drycleaner Magazine awarded Careful a prestigious honour for having the best-built plant.

"The plant is designed with an open concept, because we want our customers to see the whole company and its history," Chelsky says.

"It meant so much to us to get that award, especially since it's an American magazine and we are a Canadian company."

In addition to customer service and its unique plant, Careful is highly regarded for its impeccable quality control.

All garments are inspected multiple times and stuffed with tissue to prevent creases. Cuffs and collars are delicately dipped in starch. And the entire production process is closely monitored.

"We have to be able to differentiate Careful from everybody else, and it's the extra attention to detail that matters," Chelsky says.

"That's why we have been around for 80 years."

Careful also has deep roots in the Jewish community. Such causes as the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society, JVS, Jewish Family and Child, as well as Baycrest, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Ben-Gurion University are among the communal endeavours the family has been involved with.

As for the future, Chelsky says that as long as his children get a solid education, they are more than welcome to carry the torch.

"The other day, my son told me he was interested in working in the business," Chelsky said.

"He said, 'Dad, is it OK if I play in the NHL first and then come work with you afterward?'"

Patriots' owners partner with Israel Football League

JERUSALEM — The Israel Football League (IFL) has finalized a new sponsorship agreement with the Kraft Family, owners of the National Football League's New England Patriots.

The alliance makes the Krafts the title sponsors of the first full-contact tackle football league in Israel. Heading into its second season, the league has re-branded itself as the Kraft Family IFL, to reflect its relationship with one of the most prominent football families in the world. The IFL is operated by American Football in Israel (AFI), which is centred at Kraft Family Stadium in Jerusalem.

"Without question, this is the largest and most important partnership in league history," said AFI president Steve Leibowitz. "We are delighted that Robert and Myra Kraft and their wonderful family are once again demonstrating their support as we continue to develop the great sport of football in this region of the world."

Ben Friedman, an IFL commissioner, said that "the Kraft family involvement will ensure a banner year for both the IFL and American football in Israel at large. We're excited to kick off our upcoming season with such a significant milestone."

Robert and Myra Kraft have an extensive history of supporting football in Israel. The Kraft Family Stadium opened in Jerusalem in 2000 and provides state-of-the-art facilities for the development of a series of football leagues operating at the playing field. The Krafts visit the complex each year, and on one trip they brought along the Vince Lombardi Super Bowl trophy and sports personalities, including former NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue, NFL MVP Tom Brady and Patriots players Richard Seymour and Benjamin Watson.

During his most recent visit to Jerusalem in March, Robert Kraft viewed an IFL game and decided to lend his support. "I am thrilled to be in Israel watching tackle football for the first time," he said that night. "I get a special feeling in my heart every time I hear Hatikvah sung on a football field and hope to help this sport grow in this country."

In related news, the league also unveiled a new logo, incorporating the Kraft family name into the graphic design, which combines the images of a tightly spiraling football with the Israeli flag in its wake. The new logo will appear in all marketing communications and advertising campaigns of the league in the media, as well as on all league merchandise, at conferences, tournaments, events and games.

The IFL's second season kicked off on Nov. 16. Friedman said the leagues "continue to spread the fundamentals of football and teach the principles of sportsmanship, team unity and competition."

For more information on the Kraft Family Israel Football League, visit www.ifl.co.il.

A spin-a-thon at the Thornhill branch of Extreme Fitness recently raised $6,000 for Maccabi Canada's under-19 basketball team. The team will compete at the Maccabiah Games in Israel next year.

Organized by Michal Capland, the spin-a-thon attracted 58 participants. Capland's son, Cory, has been named to the under-19 team. Cory has played in previous Maccabi events in Argentina, Rome, New York and Orange County, Calif. A Grade 12 student, Cory also plays basketball for the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Richmond Hill campus, and is a member of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre rep team.

The spin-a-thon featured a silent auction, a sporting goods sale and refreshments donated by Bagel Brothers, No Frills and Starbucks. Other sponsors included Uplands Golf and Ski Club, The Israeli Source, Fitness Source, Lululemon Athletica, the Windsor Arms Hotel, Sporting Life, Israel's Judaica, Tutto Bene Restaurant, Shoppers Drug Mart (Thornhill), Kosher and Natural Foods, and Balloon Bash.

ALMOST FAMOUS

BY JACOB MEDJUCK

I'm studying for the Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT).

I'm 32, and I'm studying for the U.S. college entrance exams. I'm also studying for the Graduate Record Examination (GRE) and the Graduate Management Admission Test (GMAT). And I'm not even going to take any of these tests.

Specifically, I'm studying their vocabulary sections. I've decided that it's time to expand my palate of nouns and adjectives. To add adverbs and volumize my verb count.

The Inuit have 1,000 words for "snow," whereas I would probably take 1,000 words just to say snow.

I dream of excised text, of having the ability to express myself cleanly and clearly. For me, that will mean shorter sentences with richer words. But where will these new words come from? I'm hoping to satiate my language lust by binging on standardized tests. (FYI, I get two points for "satiate.")

Do you use words that you don't know the meaning of? Do you think you know their meaning but are often corroded? Are you instead perhaps meaning to use a word that rhymes with the one you're using or ends with the same three letters? Do you think if you say it fast enough, confidently or without wincing, that you can squeeze dubious dialogue into conversation, like greasing a square peg into a tiny round hole?

Did you miss a lot of school because of Yom Kippur and Rosh Hashanah?

I used to play the violin. Because the beginning of the school year is land-mined with Jewish holidays, I missed a few crucial music lessons – for example, on how to read music. I played for seven years, and for six years and eight months, my bow never touched the instrument's strings. I would pretend to hit notes by awkwardly humming along with the music. I was embarrassed when the orchestra would end a song and I would still be faking bow strokes and humming in falsetto. Yes, I missed some crucial classes those early weeks of the year.

Likewise, I suspect I missed a few crucial English classes. From time to time, I find that in order to complete a thought, I have to create a word. Yes, to satisfy my sense of expression, I create words. It's a hobby that drives my father nuts.

He'll argue, "Jacob, there are basic words we learned in school that you ignore or don't even know. And combining words you do know into new words does not resolve a sentence. You just look foolish."

I can only counter by saying that we had taken more science than he did growing up. To cover the introduction of genetics, microprocessing and subtraction in the same number of school hours, my generation may have had to sacrifice a few conjunctions.

So, now I have flash cards on my iPhone and "word of the day" on my e-mail.

But as a dizzying array of new words strobe past my eyeballs, I wonder, what is the use in learning words that no one else generally uses, neither in print nor colloquial conversation? ("Colloquial" gets me two points). How am I supposed to be clearer if other people aren't even using the supersized vocab expansion pack that I'm cramming? Tough call.

So here's the deal: rather than promote the decay of language or side with stagnation, I will continue to expand myself, by adding "recalcitrant" this week, but I would ask, to be fair, that you consider weaving some of my creations into the general lexicon, too.

I am not lazy. I am an entrepreneur of words.

And I present to you all the world première of "ethicless."

Instead of the cumbersome, tongue-chew "that man was without ethics," you can now say, "That man was ethicless."

Webster's Dictionary can find me in Vancouver to dispute. My father does regularly.

Yom Kippur owes me this much.

I am vocabulary. Hear me roar.

COLORFUL VEGETABLE LATKES

CAPLAN'S
APPLIANCES • BED SHOPPE • OUTLET

- 4 lg baking potatoes
- 2 small zucchini
- 1 egg
- 1/4 tsp. salt
- 1/4 tsp. dried rosemary
- 2 lg carrots
- 1 medium onion
- 1/4 c matzah meal
- 1/4 tsp. white pepper
- canola oil for frying

Shred potatoes, onions and zucchini. Drain approx. 15 minutes, squeezing down every few minutes. The shredded vegetables should be dry as possible. Shred carrots; add to above shredded and well-drained vegetables. Blend with remaining ingredients. Fry in small amounts of oil (approx. 2 tbl. per latke). Serve with applesauce or sour cream.

Stressed out? Exercise!

FITNESS CORNER

BY FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Did you know that there are different types of stress?

Good stress comes from exercise or exertion, and bad stress comes from a major life change, or from all the tasks you must complete in one day but can't. This latter type of stress is very bad for you, because your body must respond to it, and we have a pre-programmed system in our brain to help us react, and react fast. Back when we lived in caves, this system worked really well to keep us from being killed. Today, we don't often face short-term, life-threatening stresses, yet our way of reacting to stress remains the same.

Today, our stress is ongoing, and that's the problem. Our stress-coping system wasn't designed to be "on" all the time. It's meant to turn on in times of danger and then shut down, thus returning all our bodily systems back to normal. A system that was designed to help us deal with life-threatening stress will hurt us if it's not turned off.

Did you know that an overactive stress-response system can lead to depression, anxiety and obesity. When you're stressed, you tend to eat more and do less, so your body stores the sugar that it releases to deal with the stress as belly fat.

Unfortunately, toxins stored in belly fat are pumped directly into our organs. I look at my clients' stomachs when I see them to gauge how stressed they are that day. It's always a great indicator.

The good news is that we can combat stress by doing one simple thing. Our stress system is meant to send us into action, so when you feel stressed out, exercise. Join a kick boxing class or a spin class, or just get down and do some push-ups. You will clear your brain, burn the sugar that's being released into your body and feel better for it. So what are you waiting for? Get sweating!

The young Leboffs' allocations committee

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

It is said that giving tzedakah will bring peace. Perhaps what this means is that the development of compassion and our recognition of those outside of us brings us to a point of great empathy. Peace can only be achieved through this and lead us to a place where we will do unto others, as we would have them do unto us.

A while back, I was conversing with friends of mine, Lianne and Bruce Leboff, about parenting and tzedakah. I have known Lianne since the early 1990s when we worked at the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Bruce has volunteered extensively with Federation and the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre on the allocations side. Between the two of them, they are adept at the mechanics of raising money and distributing it. The Leboffs are very caring people and give a lot to the world through chesed.

The couple told me about a refreshing tzedakah allocations process they designed and shared with their three children – Danielle, Rachel and Stephanie. Danielle and Rachel are in Grade 6 and Stephanie is in Grade 5 – all at United Synagogue Day School.

Bruce and Lianne sat with their family and said, "Guys, here is $1,000 for you to give to tzedakah." They explained to them that many people give tzedakah emotionally, to one or a few organizations that touch them, and others wait until somebody knocks at their door.

"What we would like you to do," the parents said, "is think about which needs in our world are most important, the organizations worthy of receiving your fund, and how you will divide up the $1,000." They handed their children a sheet of paper with a list of numerous organizations dealing with Jewish and international issues and a list of questions they should ask each other, including how much money should go to Jewish causes versus non-Jewish ones.

Danielle, Rachel and Stephanie then set about talking and figuring out which charities would end up on their giving list. They huddled together as a conscientious allocations committee and debated, argued, discussed and ultimately determined where their tzedakah funds would go.

I learned their ultimate decision was very wise and ensured the greatest needs were taken care of first. The Leboffs asked that I not include the name of the recipient organizations, but did say the list included non-profits helping the Jewish people, Israel, the non-Jewish world and the animal world.

It is interesting to me that young people, given the opportunity, respect and direction, will often arrive at the same outcome as a table full of adults with degrees, staff support and years of experience behind them.

Once the allocations process was complete, the family sent a letter to each recipient charity with a cheque and a letter stating how the Leboff clan had decided on giving money to them. The reactions, according to Lianne and Bruce, were positive, and Danielle, Rachel and Stephanie felt "quite engaged by the process and the responses," Lianne and Bruce said.

I asked Bruce, the vice-president of risk management at Gluskin Sheff & Associates, what compelled the couple to implement this idea. He replied, "Many of my clients have added their older children to their charitable foundation committee, but we decided to do it earlier. Why wait until they are older?"

Teaching acts of kindness, like giving tzedakah, is paramount in child-rearing. Consider the creation of an allocation committee within your household and then pass this idea on far and wide. Soon we may all be privy to a world at peace. Yasher koach, Leboffs! Great idea.

Creative photographer designs purse-size albums

By MARNI BRINDER BYK

Special to The CJN

When you walk into Signature Studios, the first things you notice are the beautiful portraits of Canadian celebrities on the wall, including former governor general Adrienne Clarkson, poker star Daniel Negreanu and hockey player Darcy Tucker, which are all alongside a collage of owner Greg Dean's favourite photo subject – his son.

Providing wonderful memories of your simchah through creative event photography is just the beginning of the services provided by Signature Studios (416-784-4488).

Themed signing boards, billboards and posters can help set a theme and tone for any bar or bat mitzvah, just as exquisite albums can capture the beauty of a bride on her wedding day.

Client Rena Schwartz and her twin sister, Marnie, both used Signature Studios for their weddings.

"They truly understand how to make the wedding day a fun, stress-free and memorable experience for the bride, the groom, the bridal party and the family," Rena says. "Signature Studios and their staff are professional, easy to work with, and creative, as they designed unique wedding albums and mini, purse-size albums of our weddings that we proudly showcase."

Dean has been taking beautiful pictures for the last 23 years and marvels at what he can do with digital photography. A popular service he provides is taking photos in front of a green screen at a party, which are then printed up to look like magazine covers or tie into the theme of the event.

These photographs allow you and your guests to be on the cover of Rolling Stone, or stand next to a celebrity or in front of a mountain or waterfall. Using digital photography you can do just about anything, including taking pictures at the cocktail hour and projecting them throughout the evening for your guests to enjoy.

Digital photography also allows Signature Studios to create unique coffee-table-style albums of your event. Resembling a school yearbook, this style of album is more casual than a traditional album, and allows for more creativity with layout and more photos from your event. The "old" albums had an average of 36 pictures; now albums can have 150 pictures or more.

The coffee-table-style albums allow Dean to easily manipulate pictures from an event, he can turn a photo from colour to black and white. The albums can incorporate any themes from your event and focus on storytelling.

Dean emphasizes that he can provide options for any party or event in all price ranges. He believes it is just as important that "they interview us, and we interview them."

Dean says that the success of his photography comes from a good relationship between photographer and client, and for that reason he does not aggressively solicit customers.

He adds that "it is the most important day of your life and you want to enjoy it. Our clients laugh and have a good time and it shows in our pictures."

Caricatures make great keepsakes

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

Mark Ciale's works of art take less than five minutes to create, but over the years, he has found that to be enough time to make a connection with his subjects.

Having worked as a caricature artist for 20 years at bar and bat mitzvahs, holiday parties and corporate events, Ciale often runs into people who still have his drawings from five or 10 years ago.

He explains proudly that his drawings are "real keepsakes," and people enjoy taking home their own personal works of art and often display them for years, whether on their bulletin boards or in a frame.

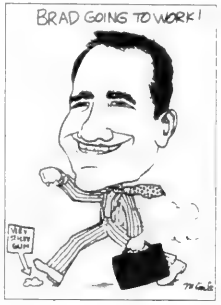
Ciale began his career studying art at the Ontario College of Art and Design (OCAD) and started doing caricature portraits at Ontario Place in the late 1980s as a summer job.

His part-time gig morphed into a full-time career when people started asking him to work at their parties, and 20 years later, he's still providing keepsakes for the next generation of partygoers.

When asked about party trends and competition, Ciale admits that these days, kids at bar and bat mitzvahs are more jaded. In a world dominated by the Internet, iPods and YouTube, children tend to think of gadgets and gizmos first.

But Ciale's 20 years of experience speak for themselves, and "people are impressed when they see things created by hand," he says.

He finds that "kids love it when they encounter it," especially because he can provide people with portraits of them participating in their favourite activities, such as baseball, or in their fantasies, such as flying or skydiving.



Over the course of an evening, Ciale can turn your guests into princesses, rock stars, prima ballerinas, NHL goalies, superheroes and more.

Is there a better way to provide tailored gifts to all of your guests?

Ciale knows that there are an endless supply of loot bag items, prizes and giveaways that you can hand out to guests at a party. But he believes that "long after everything from the loot bag is in the garbage and the henna tattoos have washed off, you still have your caricature."

Mark Ciale can be reached at 416-929-6678, or you can visit www.markciale.com.

Fruit centrepieces please everyone

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When you order a centrepiece from Catertrendz (416-636-3650) you're getting the best of two worlds.

"You get a colourful, elaborate kosher centrepiece, made up of healthy fruit," said Claire Shannon, office manager.

Catertrendz's was started up about three months ago, she said, because they realized that people are starting to turn to fruit as their only dessert, and they want an elaborate way to present it.

Catertrendz

☐ Non-Kosher

"They also serve as excellent hostess gifts, because they please everyone. When you bring a bottle of wine, even an expensive one, some don't drink, and others want red or white. Then there are the kids; they don't drink either. The fruit, however, is a hit for everyone," Shannon said.

Created by a food designer, the baskets range from the smallest flowerpot, which includes a bouquet of pineapple, blueberries, red grapes, green grapes, cantaloupes and honeydew, to the largest, a super bike, which can later be used in the garden. The baskets in the bike are filled with strawberries, honeydew, cantaloupes, pineapple, oranges, watermelon and blueberries.

"We did a bar mitzvah last week and had our fruit centrepieces on 22 tables. The guests loved it, and the hosts were pleased because it is economical. With fruit on the table, there was no need to add fruit to the sweet table," Shannon said.

They designed baskets for another event, she said, in which the hosts wanted to donate everything to charity. "We kept the baskets wrapped in cellophane and left a sign that said they were being donated. The guests were impressed."

Thinking ahead, she said, a company has ordered 30 baskets for Tu b'Shvat, which will include dried fruits. "We can do custom orders if desired," said Shannon.

If they're gonna come, they have to be invited

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

Every party starts with an announcement. Whether you're celebrating a wedding, anniversary, birthday or a bar or bat mitzvah, you have to inform your would-be guests that there will be a celebration and that they're invited.

At Invitations by Design (416-789-7367), owner Darcia Moskaluk-Rutkay has been creating custom invitations for every occasion since 1993.

Moskaluk-Rutkay's customer-friendly business is a one-stop shop for all your printing needs. All you need to do is walk in to see that a customer is only limited by his or her imagination.

Along the walls are samples representing a range of Moskaluk-Rutkay's work, and if you can't find what you're looking for, you can just ask.

"We take the aggravation out of invitation ordering," Moskaluk-Rutkay says proudly.

With her individually designed invitations and reply, thank you, and place cards, you can have most of your simchah printing needs taken care of all in one place. In fact, Invitations by Design can stuff and send out the invitations, and even monitor the replies if the customer desires.

Moskaluk-Rutkay says she tries "to make everything as easy as possible for the customer."

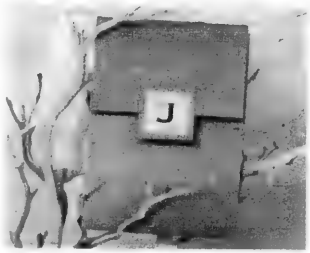
With so much to choose from, Moskaluk-Rutkay has some lovely examples of current trends in invitations. The majority of her customers, she says, come in looking for "simple and clean" invitations, and bold colours are currently very popular.

As well, people are using a lot of black-and-white invitations with bold contrasts. When discussing fonts, she displays beautiful examples of very formal invitations that use all lowercase lettering, and format-less formatting – all the information appears in a run-on sentence that flows through a paragraph instead of being displayed line by line.

As she walks through what is "hot" in invitations, a bride-to-be in the store pays close attention. Her concern is what's been done and overdone in the past.

"Vellum," Moskaluk-Rutkay says with no hesitation, adding that while vellum can look very nice, it has been replaced by eco-friendly and natural papers, which are lovely and stylish.

When asked for her top tips for current and future customers, Moskaluk-Rutkay encourages party planners to know their numbers before ordering invitations, or to at least have a good idea of how many they will need.



Invitations can be lovely and stylish.

She also encourages customers to have all the information ready – correct spellings are the client's responsibility ("Only you know how to spell your name," she says) – and she advises having a few additional sets of eyes check the proofs.

A big mistake is making assumptions about spellings and other information.

Another great tip is to come in at least five to six months before a wedding and be ready to order.

But although Moskaluk-Rutkay suggests ordering early, she warns not to send out invitations too soon.

She advises that "10 weeks [ahead of time] is too soon," and that "Canada's mail service is fantastic. It only takes a couple days to receive anything".

Moskaluk-Rutkay has a lot of advice for people choosing invitations on a budget. First, make sure that whoever designs your invitation follows Canada Post guidelines. She encourages customers to "be diligent with your designers," because postage is dependent on both size and weight.

A lot of extras in an invitation can equal extra postage. As well, heavy cardstock not only adds weight, it's always more expensive. Other tips to keeping costs down is knowing that engraved, letterpress and foil-stamped invitations are more expensive and will keep costs up.

"Buyer beware," she warns. "Invitations on the Internet look nice and cheap, but there are a lot of hidden costs."

Brokerage fees alone can double the cost of your invitations. As well, she cautions that when you don't get to see the paper before you order your invitations, you may receive poor quality paper.

There is no substitute for good customer service and getting exactly what you want, she adds.

At Invitations by Design, quality is everything.

My son's bar mitzvah in Israel

By RENA GODFREY
Special to The CJN

Just two days before my son, Sam, was about to become bar mitzvah in Israel, Rabbi Howard Markose shook Sam's hand for the first time and said, "Welcome home."

I felt a lump in my throat surface and tried not to break into my usual emotional sobbing self. Indeed, it did feel as if we were coming home, to our land and our people.

We were in the hotel lobby in Jerusalem, and Sam was nervous but excited to meet the man he had only communicated with via e-mail. In his calm and reassuring manner, Rabbi Markose listened to Sam chant his Torah portion, offering his feedback and going over the details of the service.

I left them alone, knowing that my jet-lagged, hyper disposition would not be of any help. In the few days that followed, with Rabbi Markose's comments fresh in his mind,

Setting aside a few days before the festivities began turned out to be a great idea. Three weeks before Sam's bar mitzvah, my Israeli cousin sent me a friendly e-mail informing me that the venue we had chosen for the post-bar mitzvah breakfast had just gone out of business.

PARTY PLANNER

Coming back home

Sam with the Torah.

I nervously chuckled as I fired an e-mail off to my contact in Israel, Val, from Eshet Incoming, an Israeli tour operator. Surely, there had been some mistake. As it turned out, my cousin was correct, and Val proceeded to spend endless hours trying to find a venue to accommodate our 80 guests.

Val assured me that Israelis were used to getting things done last minute. My Toronto friends gasped as I told them of the unexpected changes in my plans. I just smiled and told them that it would all work out.

In fact, the day before the bar mitzvah, I visited the new place for breakfast and was unhappy with the décor I had previously chosen. As I uttered these words, Galia, the florist, just happened to walk by. She sat down with me and quickly ordered new chair covers, new linens and new flower arrangements, all in 10 minutes.

Now, how's that for service? I smiled, thinking of all the formalities we go through in Canada.

Everyone we dealt with in Israel concerning the bar mitzvah was so appreciative and thrilled that we had chosen to have our celebration in Israel and at his or her restaurant or venue.

A meeting was always accompanied with a drink, delicious food and a warm hug. Despite the jet lag and running around before our international delegation of guests arrived, we felt energized and excited to show our family and friends beautiful Israel.

All of the months of preparation for Sam's bar mitzvah could not have prepared us for the magical time we were about to experience.

As our 50 guests started to arrive in Jerusalem, we instantly began to feel the love. Our guests' desire to travel so far to share in our happiness was a very powerful thing, and we all felt it. Friends and family instantly bonded, some just meeting one another for the first time.

At 7 a.m., everyone boarded the bus to the Jerusalem Archeological Park for Sam's service. As Sam proudly put on his tfillin and tallit for the first time, all my anxiety about the logistics of this bar mitzvah subsided. I beamed that morning, thinking to myself that this was as good as it gets – to have the privilege of watching your son chant Torah in Israel, and to have the honour of family and friends present.

Wearing no jacket or tie, or high-heeled shoes, our guests listened intently to Sam chant his Torah portion, amid a backdrop of morning sunshine, archeological ruins, drumming echoing from the Kotel and the pitter-patter of passersby, walking past us in search of a good spot to have their bar/bat mitzvah.

Tears trickled down many of our eyes, as family and friends were brought together, rejoicing together and remembering loved ones who were not present. Prayer and song were intermingled with hugs and kisses.

You may often hear people say that "it was a blur" when they recount the night of their wedding, bar/ bat mitzvah or children's simchahs. I remember it all and hope that my guests will, too. Every detail, I savour, from dancing under the stars in the garden of the Ticho House, a museum in one of the first houses in Jerusalem, with my disabled Israeli friend, Nachum, who is a wheelchair dancer, to looking at my nephew's and niece's faces as they saw and experienced Israel for the first time.

I knew I had done something right when I heard many of my guests say, "I'm coming back."

Jewelry is the perfect gift

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

Expectations are high when buying your loved ones holiday gifts, and finding the perfect presents is never easy.

This season, purchase the ultimate present that you know they'll never forget – jewelry, a perfect choice for everyone on your holiday shopping list.

Holiday shopping is a breeze when you know that you'll come across the perfect piece that reflects your loved ones, whether it's a gold initial ring for the bar mitzvah boy or a captivating diamond pendant for your wife.

Odyssey Jewellery Designers (905-737-5266, www.odysseyjewellery.com) has been in the business for more than 50 years and features a variety of eye-catching pieces imported from Rome, New York and Los Angeles, which you won't find anywhere else.

At Odyssey, you can find the ideal gift for that special someone who has everything, as Odyssey specializes in custom-made accessories that will enchant.

"Custom work is what we specialize in," said Ed Hostick, owner of Odyssey Jewellery Design. "We design and custom-make pieces right here on the premises, and it's something that we're known for. It's what sets us apart from other jewellers and is the reason why people keep coming back to us for their special occasions."

That fussy friend of yours will be grinning from ear to ear when she unwraps her custom-designed diamond earrings with matching bracelet. Those gems will forever remind her of this memorable occasion and your thoughtful gesture.

Odyssey is dedicated to diamonds, and selecting the right stone from its high-quality selection is the only obstacle you'll face when deciding on the right gift.

At Odyssey, you can find that wonderful jewel you've been dreaming of and add it to your collection of rings, bracelets, earrings and pendants.

If you've accumulated an abundant array of jewelry over the years and want to refresh your collection, Gold Step Jewellery (905-881-1606, Goldstep79.com) is the specialist to go to for remodeling and redesigning of your old pieces.

Odyssey specializes in custom-made accessories that will enchant.

All crafting is done on site, and its sales staff have an artistic eye when it comes to creating an accessory that reflects today while preserving the memory of what used to be.

"My husband does all work on the premises and has over 50 years of knowledge from the business," said Ella Weisman, co-owner of Gold Step. "He makes great suggestions to customers regarding how to remodel their jewelry, and a lot of customers appreciate the fact that they're talking a jeweller, not just a salesman."

One of the many qualities clients will appreciate about Gold Step is the personal approach staff takes when it comes to customer service.

"If someone comes in looking for a specific design, I will sit down with them and go through the jewelry books and catalogues in order to find the right piece," said Weisman, "and I help with the redesigning, too."

You could surprise your daughter this Chanukah with a platinum necklace made from her beloved grandmother's outdated earrings. Add on a jewel charm such as a Japanese pearl or an Israeli diamond, two stones the jeweller specializes in.

In addition to its repairs and redesign service, Gold Step has a glistening reputation that is reflected by its continuously growing clientele.

"Most of our customers have been with us since we opened, and now we're dealing with second- and third-generation of customers," says Weisman.

"It's like our social life is in the store, because we've known our customers for so long. And many of them tell us they won't know where they'll go if we retire."

Celebrating a kosher simchah

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

These days, you can celebrate a kosher simchah almost anywhere, thanks to on-site kosher kitchens and caterers who are willing to travel to bring the celebration of your dreams to life.

When it comes to life-cycle events, kosher comes first, insists David Lazar, the second generation behind Rose Lazar Catering (416-633-0344). "It's an event that commemorates Jewish life – a bar mitzvah or wedding, or even a bris or pidyon haben… it commemorates their heritage, so a kosher event is considered part of the process."

"We've been in business more than 35 years," says Lazar, whose mother founded the business he has run for 20 years. "We've provided services to numerous families over various generations during that period of time… we're known for the quality of our food."

Located in the Lodzer Centre Congregation, which has already completed Phase One of a multi-year plan to fully upgrade its facilities, Lazar also operates in other venues, including the Toscana Banquet Hall, Renaissance Parque and the Woodbridge Banquet Hall, all of which offer on-site kosher kitchens.

Rose Lazar Catering

☑ Kosher
☐ Non-Kosher

"We also do a lot of in-home catering," says Lazar, as well as going out to other venues, where he'll either kasher the kitchen or bring in equipment to ensure that everything is as seamless as possible.

"Most clients we deal with, they know already to call us first," Lazar says. "We can provide everything from beginning to end," from menu and dessert choices to kosher wine recommendations.

And even with Lazar's long experience, he's not sitting on his laurels. Menus need updating constantly, he says, to keep up with the latest food trends.

Today, Lazar regularly offers dishes such as "sesame orange chicken, maple mustard chicken [or] glazed apple chicken… and in meat, veal scallopini, veal marsala." On the side, dishes like cauliflower salad or a rice medley, which blends different types of exotic rices, are more popular choices these days than kasha or kishke.

Then there are beloved staple items like Lazar's mushroom crepes, known "throughout the city as one of our feature products."

One trend Lazar suspects is on its way out is "stations" booths where dishes as diverse as sushi, dim sum, potatoes, pasta or sandwiches are custom-prepared on the spot. While it's still a great idea for dessert or salads, too often a station simply becomes a bottleneck, a place the party grinds to a halt. "People want to have their food and party, they don't want to line up for half an hour waiting for food," he says.

Beverly Hills Catering

☐ Non-Kosher

Lazar keeps his finger on the pulse of the community by tracking repeat customers and referrals, people, he says, who "know they're getting value, they're getting quality – they're getting something they can present to their guests and feel comfortable with."

Just recently, Lazar says, he catered a bar mitzvah for a family's fourth and last child – all four were Rose Lazar simchahs. "The next one's the wedding, they said."

Raphy Amar of Beverly Hills Catering (416-822-7056) agrees that kosher food should be something hosts and guests take for granted and enjoy as much as anything they can find outside the community. "Kosher has come such a long way in the last 10 to 15 years… the trendsetting ways that caterers are putting out food and presenting it – sometimes, it blows away the non-kosher competition."

Located in Petach Tikva Congregation, Amar recently left Le Parc Banquet Hall after 15 years to become the exclusive kosher caterer for the three upscale venues run by byPeterandPauls.com in the Greater Toronto Area's northwest – the Paramount, Bellagio and the Manor.

With a capacity of up to 1,650 guests in five rooms, the Paramount makes it easy to hold a breathtaking simchah – with food to match.

"Everything is plated… it is not french-served, it is all plated," meaning the plates are designed to perfection within the state-of-the-art kosher kitchens, says Amar. "They produce meals at a certain speed which is unbelievable – the service is of impeccable excellence.

"Guests can start the party with appetizers such as sea bass or pizza from built-in wood-burning oven, followed by main courses such as Canadian lamb chops, veal chop, a variety of different chicken [entrées] and then duck being one of my signature dishes."

Even if you've never been to The Paramount or Le Parc, you may know Amar's food from Gladstone's Wine Bar and Grill (now closed). Before coming to Toronto, Amar worked "catering to the who's who for 10 years in Los Angeles," followed by a catering venture in Montreal, where, he says, he truly came to understand the importance of food to the Jewish community.

Any Beverly Hills Catering event begins with a call to Amar, to discuss both menu and venue. At the Paramount, for example, Amar says, "it's an all-inclusive package… I've always been known for this: facility, food, beverages, standard and premium bars." Every Paramount affair has a captain and a maitre d' who runs each individual function," he says, who are all "top, top professionals in the industry."

While he's thrilled he can now offer full service through the trio of bypeterandpauls.com venues, he's also happy to take his services on the road and set up almost anywhere for groups of 100 or more. "I will do house caterings, golf courses, hotels… wherever the COR will allow a kosher function to happen, I will go."

"When I put a package together, the food and presentation for each individual event is what makes it exciting. It's not the same food over and over again."

A soundtrack for your simchah

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

It's a conundrum: when it comes to music, hosts are looking for entertainment with experience – but also something slightly different. Two Toronto bands, The Rick Levine Band and One More Time, are drawing on their experience – each has over 20 years' – to offer new, exciting ways to move and groove.

One More Time (http://www.onemoretime.ca; 416-484-1044) is the latest pairing of musicians Shelley Miller and Robin Langdon, who have worked together and separately since the 1980s. Billed as "the smoothest rock 'n' soul band for all your boomer party needs," they're serving up an energetic party mix of classics like the Pointer Sisters, BeeGees and Four Tops.

One More Time is the latest incarnation of Shelley Miller and Robin Langdon, who take their music to the next level with complex harmonies and non-stop medleys.

Since Langdon met Miller in the '80s as part of the Saul Helman Band, he estimates that the band's five core members have played around 12,000 simchahs and corporate events, including several generations within the same family: "weddings, bar mitzvahs, then weddings of some of those bar mitzvah kids."

Their newest incarnation, One More Time, represents Miller and Langdon's efforts to refocus not only on the hits, but on taking their music to the next level with complex harmonies and non-stop hit medleys.

"Medleys give us the kind of thing that a DJ can do," Miller explains. "We keep the music going for 16 to 20 minutes – start off fast, then slow… we mix it up so you don't drop dead," varying the pace so everyone finds something they can dance to.

"It feels like you're working with a DJ except we're live," he says. Instead of spinning one song after another, the seasoned professionals of One More Time get into the performance, moving around, crooning love songs. "When you look at the stage… there are no musicians sitting on chairs looking out the window; everybody's singing, it's very visual."

To Miller, it's important to stay in tune with the party's mood. "I look out from the stage… if people have to lean over to talk to their neighbours, it's too loud." The goal is to add a meaningful soundtrack to the event, not deafen guests. "The loudest music that's played is probably a horah."

With its flexible size ranging from five musicians and singers and up, One More Time can accommodate all of hosts' favourites.

Prospective clients can even attend one of their frequent rehearsals, where they are constantly building the band's sound and repertoire. With three- and four-part vocals – even the option of an entire a cappella set for Shabbat celebrations – and its unique medleys, One More Time adds its distinctive twist to rock classics.

The hard work pays off when band members look out and see guests rocking along. "The caterers get angry," he jokes. "People are singing, not eating."

For The Rick Levine Band (http://www.thericklevineband.com; 905-881-6400), music is just part of the good times. "We're an entertainment company," says Rick Levine, "with over 30 years of experience to provide music and entertainment to give people a wonderful time at their simchah."

To provide seamless, non-stop entertainment for guests of all ages, a DJ always comes with the band. "It's an opportunity for people to have all their musical styles covered," says Levine. Many younger guests prefer contemporary music played by a DJ, while rock classics and Jewish traditional music take advantage of the live format.

"In addition to a very contemporary and modern repertoire, we have a strong traditional repertoire that we perform in Yiddish and in Hebrew; we have music that will satisfy the European crowd as well," says Levine. His goal is to offer "music that fills the dance floor – the right mixture of classic party tunes and romantic on the spot requests."

The DJ can mean big savings if the party runs late. While band members are happy to stay at a pro-rated amount, there's no additional fee for the DJ to stick around as long as there are guests willing to dance the night away. "That's a big bonus for people who want to stay within budget."

The Rick Levine Band is the house band at the Old Mill, where they'll appear over New Year's Eve (it'll be "the most memorable New Year's of your life," Levine promises). They've also played New Year's at the CN Tower, Israel Day at Mel Lastman Square and other moments to remember over the years. Many video clips are available on the band's website.

Levine also draws on his experience and inside contacts in the party-planning business to organize and promote TorontoPartyGuide.com, a website and party-planning show to be held Jan. 20, 2009, in the Centennial Ballroom at Events and Catering On the Park (on the former site of Inn on the Park).

"It's a fantastic show," Levine says, with businesses and services in all areas of party planning, an opportunity to "meet professionals who will help them make a fantastic party" – something Levine knows lots about, as the recorded audio testimonials on his website prove.

Mix in a dash of contemporary and the non-stop fun of a DJ and you've got the soundtrack for more than just the same old simchah.

One-stop party shops
help make the planning easy

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

To save time when organizing the loot bags or centrepieces for your simchah, you should visit a one-stop party supplies retailer. Candies, balloons, trinkets and other novelty items are easier to choose when they're all at one location and you can compare colours and arrangements and wrap up your ideas into a perfect package.

Kosher n' Natural will help you assemble beautiful gift baskets, elaborate centrepieces and take-home party favours for your event, as it carries just about every kind of kosher candy you could imagine, including chocolates, gummies, sours, nuts, dried fruits and jelly beans.

"We cater to weddings, engagement parties, baby namings, brisses, bar and bat mitzvahs, and any other party event," said owner Jack Schnoll, who's been running the business for the past 27 years. "In addition to selling candy, we rent out candy machines and lay out beautiful and sweet candy tables. The rental machines include candy floss, popcorn, mini-doughnuts, soft pretzels and sno-cones."

A party isn't much of a celebration without balloons, and Balloon Bash is your one-stop shop for balloons and other party supplies. Hanit Goldberg is a former party planner who recently took over ownership of Balloon Bash, and her expertise in organizing simchahs and helping customers meet their needs is evident in her creative techniques and designs.

"We do balloon decor and can craft anything from balloons – like balloon sculptures, balloon arches, trees, scenery – just name it and we can make it from balloons," she said. "We work with themes as well. We've done musicals, and I have a rap style theme coming up. I can make clouds out of balloons, hot air balloons everything."

Recently, Goldberg put together an Arabian Nights celebration where she decorated a hall with tents and used balloons to transform the room into an Arabian castle and desert.

"To see the hall at the end when it's all decorated is my favourite part of the job," she said. "When I see the end results, especially with theme parties, I take it all in and walk around to admire it."

In addition to balloons, Balloon Bash rents candy machines; sells kosher candy in bulk; can create gift baskets, centrepieces and loot bags; and assembles the sweet table for your party.

Doing everything party-related

"We do everything party-related. We're the one-stop shop for all your party needs," Goldberg said.

If you're having difficulty deciding on what kind of set-up you'd like for your festivity, turn to Goldberg and she'll help reduce your stress and frustration.

"If you're struggling with ideas, we're definitely the place to go to. If you already have an idea in mind, you can trust us to create the best possible look for your party's decoration," she said. "We can work around any theme and we're very reliable. I've been in the party business for a long time, and I was a party planner before Balloon Bash. I come from a background where I know what people are looking for and the stress of planning a party,"

To contact Goldberg at Balloon Bash, call 905-707-8177 or pop by the store at 7241 Bathurst St. For more information, visit www.balloonbash.com

To speak with Schnoll from Kosher n Natural, call 416-789-7173, or visit him at 3193 Bathurst St, two lights north of Lawrence plaza.

Cantor's singing makes events 'extra beautiful'

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

ECE teacher Brooke Yasskin has been married for 2-1/2 years, but her memories of her wedding are still very vivid, she says.

One of the highlights of the simchah, which was held at the Oakdale Golf & Country Club, was the "beautiful ceremony" performed by Cantor Deborah Staiman, Yasskin says. "Even today people still talk about our ceremony."

She says the service was very personal, explaining that Staiman met with her and her fiancé, criminal lawyer Michael Yasskin, to get to know them as individuals and as a couple and then incorporated the details into the ceremony. "It was a very intimate service."

The icing on the cake was Staiman's singing, she adds. "We were very lucky to have someone with such a beautiful voice to officiate at our wedding.

"She is naturally gifted. She asked us if she could sing all the prayers. Her singing made the ceremony extra beautiful."

Staiman smiles when told about the comments from Yasskin. "It's very rewarding to hear that kind of feedback."

Cantor Deborah Staiman

The cantor says she spends a lot of time preparing for the services where she officiates. As a cantor, she is recognized by the government as a member of the clergy and so she can legally conduct marriage ceremonies. "I love performing weddings. I've been officiating at weddings since I was invested as cantor in 1991."

Staiman explains that she does a traditional ceremony. People often have musical requests, and if it's appropriate, she can incorporate them into the service.

"The music is chosen by myself and the bride and groom. We all sit down together. I can offer a musically beautiful service."

She stresses that she does a very personalized wedding address. "I spend a lot of time preparing so it can be meaningful to the couple and their guests."

Staiman also officiates at bar and bat mitzvahs, funerals, baby namings and interfaith marriage ceremonies.

In addition to the cantorial services, she also has a large, private, voice-training and singing studio.

Staiman, a native Torontonian, has been singing since the age of 12, when she sang with the Canadian Opera Children's Chorus. "I fell in love with opera."

Training as a soprano, she also sang in her synagogue. "I was the first confirmand at Holy Blossom Temple to sing my part in the service."

She taught music there during her undergraduate years at the University of Toronto, where she received a bachelor of music. At that time, she was also a soloist in the Adath Israel professional choir.

After graduating from U of T, Staiman was a student in the opera program at the Guildhall School of Music and Drama in London, England. She subsequently spent two years in Italy studying opera before moving to the Big Apple.

While she continued to perform opera and do voice and performance coaching, she became more involved with her synagogue and found herself drawn to cantorial music. She returned to school to become a cantor, getting her master's of sacred music from Hebrew Union College/Jewish Institute of Religion in New York City in 1991.

A member of the American Conference of Cantors, Staiman has served in congregations in New Jersey and Florida. During this time, she officiated at a lot of wedding ceremonies and other life cycle events. She returned to Toronto in 2002, to be near her parents and other family members.

In addition to her cantorial, work, she performs Yiddish and Israeli music, and she has an extensive Broadway repertoire, she says.

"I feel blessed that as a cantor I am able to combine my two loves – Judaism and singing."

Staiman can be reached at 416-483-9532.

"We offer one-stop shopping for any event," says Antunes. In addition to DJ, photo and video services, there is also an on-site event planner.

"Every occasion will be accommodated with the company's special touch.

"Our menu is international cuisine. The food is outstanding. We're known for our food."

The company does a lot of kosher events, he says. "Our official kosher caterer is Beverly Hills."

The three banquet facilities are located just north of Toronto. The Manor (16750 Weston Rd.) is near Highway 400 and the Aurora Sideroad; the Bellagio (8540 Jane St.) is in Vaughan, and the Paramount (222 Rowntree Dairy Rd.) is also in Vaughan, near Weston Road and Highway 7.

The Manor, a regal three-storey, 34,000-square-foot facility, overlooks a six-acre pond, on 120 acres on the grounds of the Carrying Place Golf and Country Club. It's an ideal venue for an indoor-outdoor wedding, says Antunes.

The Manor's three banquet halls can accommodate up to 950 guests over three separate areas for a sit-down dinner and dancing.

The Bellagio, a lavish European-style banquet facility, can hold a party for 800 guests over three rooms. The main room, Sala Bellagio, with its 1,400-square-foot dance floor has a 500-guest capacity.

With its state-of-the-art audio-visual equipment, the Bellagio is an ideal venue for corporate parties, weddings and bar/bat mitzvahs, says Antunes. "It's one of our premier banquet and meeting facilities. The grand lobby is separated by automatic drapes.

"It's an exclusive boutique concept. There's no partition wall. You have your own private entrance."

The Bellagio also has a bridal suite and a VIP lounge with its own private bar for the guests. It has a private cocktail area on the second floor if people find the music too loud, Antunes says.

The Paramount is the company's newest facility.

Sala Tremezzo, the smallest of Bellagio's halls, is "ideal for intimate functions of up to 75 guests," says Antunes. "It is a self-contained room with a private separate entrance and bar."

He says the Paramount, the company's newest facility, is a 63,000-square-foot elegant conference space. "It's designed for any corporate event, fundraiser, trade show, wedding or bar mitzvah.

The rooms have separate entrances and private foyers. "The Paramount can accommodate anywhere from 10 to 1,650 guests over five rooms altogether.

There are 600 ground-level parking spots and valet parking, as well as state-of-the-art audio-visual equipment such as a multi-live performance stage and the capability of filming and projecting continuous live images of the event onto large screens.

The Sinatra and Eastwood halls on the main floor have built-in food stations, and each accommodates 300 guests.

The two halls on the second floor, Taylor and Monroe, each hold a maximum 130 people for dinner and dancing.

But the show-stopper is the Hudson, the main banquet hall on the first floor. It has capacity for 400 people for dinner and dancing, Antunes says. "It has 25-foot ceilings and a "fairy-tale" cascading staircase.

Liberty Grand is a popular venue for upscale events

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

For a venue that makes a regal impression, consider the lavish Liberty Grand Entertainment Complex for your simchah.

Erected in 1926, the historic 100,000-square-foot estate has been playing host to a wide array of events for more than 10 years. At the lakefront in downtown Toronto, the Liberty Grand exudes magnificence and luxury. It's become a popular location for upscale events and functions.

The Liberty Grand (www.libertygrand.com or 416-542-3789) encompasses three spectacular banquet rooms, one transformable, multi-faceted space and a beautiful courtyard. The complex meets all interior standards on account of its various looks, including a classic ambience with sparkling chandeliers and stately ceilings, and a contemporary space with flashy lighting and sound capabilities.

When booking your event, the Liberty Grand offers a complimentary events coordinator who will hold your hand every step of the way to help you arrange the perfect décor, menu and lighting for your wedding, bar or bat mitzvah, anniversary or other function. Although the Liberty Grand doesn't have a kosher kitchen, the venue does accommodate those who require a kosher menu or specific diet.

"All our catering is done in-house with the exception of kosher catering, but clients are permitted to bring in outside kosher caterers for their occasion," says Robert Rosset, director of sales and catering for the Liberty Grand. "However, we do offer kosher catering where the food is prepared at an off-premise catering company."

There's no event too small or too large for the Liberty Grand, which is wheelchair accessible and can accommodate parties from 100 guests to 3,000. Its staff are committed to delivering high-quality service and hospitality for every occasion.

Flexibility is key with every decision made for your party, and the Liberty Grand will bend over backward to ensure all your desires – which can change frequently – are sufficiently met.

"Our facilities are built for multi-use and function, and they're not restrictive in how people can use the building," says Rosset. "We have a lot of room for great growth potential, and if events start off small, there's enough space to expand and grow larger."

The Artifacts Room is often used for bar or bat mitzvahs because it's easily transformable and holds sufficient amenities for projecting acute audio and lighting. The room has successfully hosted parties for the 2001 Toronto International Film Festival, Toronto Fashion Week's Fall/Winter 2001 and Spring/Summer 2002 and the Leaf Fund Annual Casino Night Fundraisers.

Consultants 'hold your hand' during simchah-planning process

By SHLOMIT KRIGER
Special to The CJN

Planning your special occasion may seem like a breeze, but there are numerous details and possibilities to track that can leave you stressed and take away from the joy that you felt when you initially decided on the simchah.

To help ensure the journey to your big day is as relaxing and organized as can be, there are some great event planning services based in Toronto. They include Cherry & Baker and Associates, owned by Sarah Cherry and Marsha Baker (office 905-771-1121; Sarah Cherry 416-819-7121; Marsha Baker 416-520-0684) and C&C Eventz, run by Claudi Foorer (416-720-4616, cfoorer@rogers.com). Both companies specialize in planning an array of personal events locally and abroad, including weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs, and Cherry & Baker also assists with corporate parties.

While finding party consultants to work with often happens through word- of-mouth, Cherry, Baker and Foorer all stress that it's important for clients to meet with the consultants and ensure they feel there is a good connection.

"You'll have to rely on the consultants and trust their advice and opinions, so there needs to be a good fit," said Foorer.

"It's crucial that you're on the same wavelength and feel comfortable with the person," added Baker. "You'll spend lots of time with them."

The consultants at Cherry & Baker and C&C Eventz are known for being friendly and approachable. They offer clients guidance throughout the entire planning process rather than leaving things to the last minute, which helps everyone involved stay more relaxed.

"We meet with clients as often as they feel they need us," said Cherry, "and we'll call them to ask if they need anything else. We want our relationship to continue beyond the sole event, and we've had clients come back to us for additional events."

"You need to be the guest at your event on the day of and have all the hassle taken off your hands and your mind put at ease," added Foorer. "My staff and I are there to hold your hand in the process and keep you on track."

Party consultants can also remind clients of things they wouldn't necessarily think of and help negotiate properly with vendors.

Foorer recommends that clients share with the consultants as much of their vision for their events as possible so they can better help the clients create that. For one bar mitzvah, she co-ordinated the setup and decorations used to make a venue feel like a marketplace with various culture-related stations. At a wedding she helped plan, a belly dancer performed, in addition to the band.

This past summer, Cherry & Baker organized former Edmonton Oilers hockey player Raffi Torres' wedding, for which the consultants had to remain aware of security and privacy issues. The company also recently assisted with a bar mitzvah party for which the consultants got special furniture built.

"No two parties are alike," said Cherry. "We work with people's budgets, and we don't just use the same ideas and vendors over and over."

The consultants at C&C and Cherry & Baker are very organized and remain composed at all times.

"I'm calm and in control of everything at the same time," said Foorer.

"We help to keep the atmosphere calm," explained Baker. "If we walk around stressed out, this will lead others to feel that way. We want to create a very friendly atmosphere with everyone at the event."

All kinds of things can come up in the planning process or during events that consultants can help deal with. Cherry & Baker provides extra items for events such as bridal veils and extra socks, just in case something may be missing on the day of the event.

"I don't think anyone realizes how much they'll rely on us," said Baker. "We've even had someone unfortunately pass away at a wedding. You have to be able to deal with crisis without creating a crisis."

"We've always got each other's back covered," added Cherry, "and we respond quickly. We're the smallest amount of money that people pay for the biggest insurance."

The earlier clients contact event consultants in the planning process the better, although it's never too late. Cherry & Baker and C&C are already booking clients for events that will run in a few years.

"You'll benefit more if you notify consultants early, because you'll have more choices and availability for your event and they can help you more along the way," said Foorer.

Caterers provide food to remember

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

When organizing an event, the decor, venue and entertainment are all very important, but what everyone remembers the next day is the food. That's where Catering by Risa and Hudson's Bay Catering come in.

Catering by Risa is the brainchild of Risa Levine-Falus, who has been in the food business for 25 years. Levine-Falus describes her food as dairy vegetarian, and says she is the only nut-free caterer in Toronto.

"What has set us apart is being nut free," said Levine-Falus, whose son has a nut allergy. "When your kid is allergic, it's not [enough] to wipe off a cutting board."

Her company, with Chef Brent Usprech at the helm, caters everything from intimate Shabbat dinners and shivah meals to parties for 300, and she prides herself on being available at a moment's notice.

"I want people to know they can call Risa and Risa will take care of it," she said.

Levine-Falus has also made it her goal to be the caterer who gets called on to look after the smaller day-to-day events, not just the big ones.

"I'm a life cycle caterer," she said. "I don't want to be the caterer you call once for a family event."

The food Levine-Falus makes reflects this desire. Her catering menu includes a variety of blintzes, kugels and dairy platters – all completely nut free. She also has a special events menu, which includes more upscale dishes such as honey lime marinated salmon with corn relish. For vegetarians, her chickpea and tomato curry is a hit.

Desserts also play a leading role in the Catering by Risa kitchen, with most made from scratch. Pamela Sacchi, of Cookie Crumbs, bakes shortbread-based cookies in flavours like coconut, cranberry orange and lemon. Apple crisp and blueberry tarts are also favourites.

While Levine-Falus admits finding products made without nuts can be a daunting task, she stresses that 'nut free' does not mean 'taste free.'

"Our objective is not to take things away but to make things delicious," she said.

Another company with a long history in the food industry is Hudson's Bay Catering, which has been keeping Toronto residents fed for 80 years. Under Executive Chef Anne Donnelly, who has been with the company for 20 years, they are able to accommodate almost any food preference. They recently catered a wedding with Greek and Japanese food, said catering and restaurant manager Jennifer Prince.

☑ Non-Kosher

Hudson's Bay Catering does all the meal preparation for the Arcadian Court, located on the 8th floor of The Bay downtown, and is equipped to do offsite catering as well.

They have fixed menus which offer a wide variety of soups, salads, pastas and meat dishes, but are extremely flexible and willing to work with clients to change the menu. They are also able to work with all different budgets.

Some favourite dishes include potato leek soup, spinach salad with mandarin oranges, cucumber and lime yogurt dressing, and Atlantic salmon with rice and mushrooms, wrapped in a phyllo pastry. For dessert, chocolate paté with raspberry sorbet is a crowd pleaser.

Other non-kosher caterers advertising in this supplement are: Lesley's Party Sandwiches & Catering, 905-660-0551; Urban Fare Catering, 416-532-1010.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Readers interested in Israel will derive much satisfaction from John Bowker's coffee-table book Aerial Atlas of the Holy Land (Firefly Books).

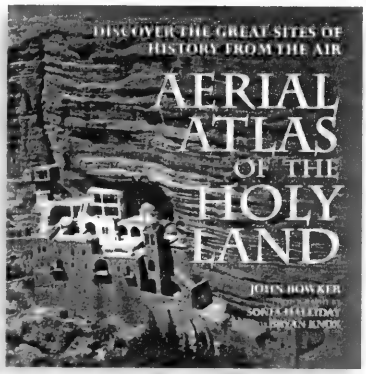
The Holy Land, encompassing present day Israel and the Palestinian territories, has historically been important as a land bridge between Africa and Asia and as a cauldron of regional and religious rivalries.

This book addresses these issues and offers a panoramic view of the region's physical attributes and architectural wonders, thanks to the stunning photographs of Sonia Halliday and Bryan Knox.

This beautifully produced book will make an excellent birthday or bar/bat mitzvah present.

Bowker, a British specialist in religious studies, ranges far and wide as he surveys a coveted piece of real estate conquered by a succession of empires over the centuries.

Displaying a deep breadth of knowledge, he describes a series of events from the Israelite settlement of the Land of Israel and the Assyrian interregnum to the Babylonian exile and the Persian and Hellenistic periods.



Segueing from the Hasmonean and Roman eras, he analyzes the Jewish revolt and the Muslim invasion.

The book is basically divided into three broad chapters: The River Jordan, The Hill Country and The Coastal Plain.

The first chapter covers such topics as Mount Hermon, Hazor, the Sea of Galilee, the Dead Sea and Ein Gedi, Qumran, Masada and Christian monasteries.

The third chapter deals with Gaza, Ashkelon Ashdod, Jaffa, Caesarea, Megiddo, Mount Carmel and Haifa and the Crusades.

Alluding to the Jordan River, he refers to Joshua 3:13. Describing Tiberias, he points out that it was founded by Herod Antipas, a friend of the Roman emperor Tiberius.

Reflecting on Masada, he recalls the Roman siege and the fierce resistance of the Zealots. Evoking Jerusalem, he dwells on its centrality as a fount of three related religions: Judaism, Christianity and Islam.

Contemplating the ruins of ancient synagogues, he takes us to, among other places, Tiberias, Gamla and Baram.

Bowker's survey of Israel's coastal cities, from Ashdod to Tel Aviv, is succinct and descriptive.

Leafing through the book, one cannot but be impressed by such monumental buildings as the Citadel in Jerusalem, Mar Saba monastery in the Judean Desert, the Cistercian monastery in Latrun and the Franciscan Church of the Annunciation in Nazareth.

The landscapes are equally striking: the silvery waters of the Sea of Galilee in the early morning, Jericho as seen from the desolation of Wadi Qelt, the rugged shore of the Dead Sea, Mount Tabor rising from the Jezreel Valley, the wooded peak of Mount Gerizim in Nablus, the enticing beaches of Ashkelon and the splendour of Jaffa harbour.

With Bowker as your guide, Israel and the Palestinian areas unfold gloriously. Spanning 256 pages, this is a book well worth reading, re-reading and savouring.

Combining excellent music with great food

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

If you're looking for a fun place to hold your next simchah in the heart of downtown Toronto, look no further than the Hard Rock Cafe (279 Yonge Street; 416-362-3636).

Located at the corner of Yonge and Dundas streets – the busiest intersection in the city-Hard Rock is the perfect place to hold a "fun-filled, music-oriented and energetic event," said Marcelo DeOliveira, director of sales and marketing for Hard Rock.

At the Hard Rock, their goal is to provide the best entertainment possible and have guests leave completely satisfied with the experience. And with a full audio-visual system, the ability to host DJs, bands, and whoever or whatever else their clients can think of, that is exactly what they do.

Robin Kerbel, who had her daughter's bat mitzvah at the Hard Rock in October, was very happy with the finished product.

"It's a great venue for a party, the food was excellent and the ambience is really amazing since you don't have to do a lot of work on décor to make the room look good. I would highly recommend it for any type of party," she said.

The Hard Rock Café

- ☐ Fully Kosher Facility
- ☐ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☑ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☑ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☑ 100-300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Over 300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Wheelchair Accessible

Andy Kazman, whose son recently celebrated his bar mitzvah at Hard Rock, chose Hard Rock for the music and was not disappointed.

"For us the music was more important than anything, and they were all very equipped for that as we brought in a live band as well as a DJ. It was like being at a great club with all of our family and friends," Kazman said.

Along with the unique atmosphere, which includes memorabilia from a host of legendary musicians, the food at Hard Rock is hard to beat.

"We offer a wide range of items for our clients to choose from, and we assist them in building their very own and unique menu. No two events are the same," DeOliveira said.

For the younger crowd, mini cheese and vegetarian pizzas, chicken fingers, and mini burgers with fries are popular dinner choices. For dessert, candy stations and make-your-own sundae stations are always a hit, he said.

Adults, meanwhile, gravitate toward seared vegetarian dim sum and vegetarian California rolls. Poached wild Alaskan sockeye salmon and grilled beef tenderloin are also crowd pleasers, and for dessert, white and dark chocolate mousse topped with Grand Marnier and Kahlua, or a milk chocolate fountain with fresh fruit, sends guests home with many sweet memories.

While the cafe does not have a kosher kitchen, guests have the option of hiring a kosher caterer, although none of their clients have done so, DeOliveira said, some instead choosing to bring in a few kosher meals for some of their guests.

Other than the delicious food and top-notch entertainment, what makes Hard Rock a great place for events is their versatility, said DeOliveira.

"[We] offer two separate levels that can be used for any type of event, the Hard Rock Cafe and the Hard Rock Lounge.

"Our Hard Rock Lounge, located on the second floor, is the most used room for private events and offers all of our clients the ability to fully customize their events. Like starting a painting on a white canvas, the possibilities are endless."

Another advantage is that this "white canvas" can accommodate up to 350 people, depending on what style of event clients choose.

"Our Yonge-Dundas location can accommodate up to 250 people for a dinner-dance combination using both floors. For the Hard Rock Lounge we recommend a maximum of 180 people for a dinner-dance combination or up to 350 people for a standing reception-dance combination," DeOliveira said.

Not only does Hard Rock provide an excellent spot for events, they also take care of all the event details, said DeOliviera.

"We always ask our clients to be a guest of their own event and let us look after all the details."

The Israeli Source has it all – for less

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

Once upon a time, Chuck and Barbara Elnekave met and fell in love at work. Now, as owners of The Israeli Source, they own a business together that they both love.

The two opened the store three years ago with what Chuck calls a "wholesale-to-the-public approach to Judaica," and although he says the store also has a "no-frills approach," it has well-organized displays of everything you could ever want for a Jewish home.

The Israeli Source, located at 60 Doncaster Ave., Unit 1 (905-482-2025) provides items for every taste, holiday, interest and simchah. For Chanukah alone, it features a multitude of chanukiyot, as well as dreidels to decorate, a Crayola Happy Hanukah Cookie painting kit, and my personal Chanukah favourite: Chinese food take-out boxes with "Happy Hanukah" on the side of the box.

There's no doubt that The Israeli Source has everything you need for the Jewish holidays.

When asked about top sellers, Chuck immediately directs me to Susie Fishbein's Kosher by Design cookbook series, which he says has an almost cult-like following. The store sold 750 copies of her Passover by Design cookbook, and the Elnekaves predict that her next book, Kosher by Design Lightens Up, will also be very popular with customers.

As Chuck discusses the series, one shopper interrupts him to confirm the release date of Fishbein's next cookbook, proving not only Fishbein's popularity, but also that Chuck and Barbara know what their customers want.

In addition to the wide variety of kosher and Jewish cookbooks, the store has joke books, novels, biographies, children's siddurim, Hebrew baby name books, Haggadahs and much more, including popular children's books translated into Hebrew, such as the Dr. Seuss series and Dora the Explorer books.

Turn the corner and you stumble across Shabbat lamps and locks, aprons, Shabbat and kosher kitchen items, "kosher for Passover" and "Pareve" labels to affix to food items and containers, and a very hilarious and useful bright yellow "Pesach Line Do Not Cross" marking tape, which is Chuck's invention.

Resembling police caution tape, you can use this Pesach novelty to mark cupboards or areas in your home as you prepare for the holiday.

Chuck laughs as he tells me that one family put it on their front door during Pesach while they were out of town.

At every turn, you'll find traditional and modern versions of a variety of items, including mezuzot, some of which are like pieces of art; kippot of all colours, as well as with a wide selection of sports team logos and other designs; decorative and plain tallit bags; ketubot, seder plates; matzah plates; serving dishes, and more.

The store also has jewelry, children's toys, cards, videos and music, and the selection changes all the time. The store has its own retail website you can order from, but with new items coming in all the time, it's hard to make sure everything gets on the site. If you're looking for something specific and you can't find it on the website, call, e-mail or visit the store. There's a good chance Chuck and Barbara have it, or will be getting it soon.

Chuck sums up the this way: "We offer a variety that can suit anyone's tastes, and we do it at the best prices around."

CHANGE IS MINT

JARED FLORENCE PASSES THE MICROPHONE TO MINT'S NEXT GENERATION OF STARS

Change is constant. It is the one thing we can be sure of. Embracing change allows us to see new opportunities, opening up a whole new world of limitless possibilities. After 18 years of service in Toronto's Bar and Bat Mitzvah industry, event entrepreneur and consummate entertainer Jared Florence is leaving the stage to pursue projects that will allow him to spend more time with his beautiful wife and baby triplets. While Jared will no longer be involved in the daily operations of Mint Events, he will continue to maintain his relationship with the company, producing and performing at exclusive events. Mint Partners, Jordan Fogle and Noah Cappe, along with the entire Mint family embrace this change, and wish Jared and his family continued health, happiness and success for the future.

Videographer keeps up with the latest technology

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

Darren Sager picked up his first camera in the early 1980s and quickly acquired a reputation among friends and family as the go-to guy for event videography.

Decades later, his company, DMS Video Productions (905-738-5510, www.dmsvideo.com), has ascended above the competition and excels in the realm of events videography.

"In the Jewish community, we are known as the go-to people for weddings and bar and bat mitzvah event videography, and the work we produce is always current," said Sager.

"DMS is always in the forefront of current effects, and we're known for this. The company was the first to go digital, use DVDs, blue ray and high def, and all the technology that I know will win my clients over."

It's impossible to compare DMS to other video production companies, because it's ahead of its competitors with its advanced technology, reliable equipment and the outstanding programs it creates.

Selecting your videographer is a big decision, and you don't want to leave your memories in the hands of a company that's unprofessional and erratic. With all that's happening at your simchah, whether it's an intimate Chanukah party or over-the-top wedding, it's impossible to take everything in at once, which is why you want to hire someone who will capture every single moment on film. DMS will catalogue your entire evening onto your event's video, encapsulating your memories for you to relive for the years to come.

The 'go-to people'

DMS prides itself on its outstanding video programs as much as its professionalism, and it shows when you walk into its office.

"As soon as a client sees our studio, there's a complete sense of comfort and the atmosphere illustrates that you're dealing with a professional," said Sager. "Other videographers work from home in their basements, and you get a completely different feel when you go into a professional office as opposed to a home."

Every day, Sager spends hours reviewing Internet websites and reading newsletters relating to today's current trends in multimedia, and his up-to-date understanding of the field is reflected in his work.

"If you want to do it professionally and right you have to upgrade. It's pricey, but it pays off in the final product and shows in our reputation."

In addition to bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings, DMS does birthdays, anniversaries, showers and engagement parties. Its sister company, 5Gear Studio, specializes in TV commercials, large corporate events, music videos and other areas that are outside videography.

"Aside from our dependable reputation, comparing us to other video production companies over the phone is dangerous, because over the phone we're just a name," said Sager. "You wouldn't buy your wedding dress over the phone, so you shouldn't buy your videographer over the phone."

Venues provide impeccable accommodations

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

There are hundreds of venues within and around Toronto, which makes finding the perfect one utterly nerve-racking.

You want your event's setting to have an atmosphere that echoes that of your party, a team of catering staff that bends over backward to satisfy your guests and an events co-ordinator who will get you exactly what you need when you need it.

Atlantis Pavilions (416-260-8000; info@atlantispavilions.com; www.atlantispavilions.com) and the Westin Prince Hotel (416-444-2511; www.westin.com/prince) are two exquisite locales with breathtaking scenery and impeccable accommodations.

Atlantis Pavilion

- ☐ Fully Kosher Facility
- ☐ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☑ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☑ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☑ 100-300 Person Capacity
- ☐ Over 300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Wheelchair Accessible

Situated on Lake Ontario, Atlantis Pavilions is the perfect choice for those looking for a unique ambience to make their extraordinary night a monumental one.

"We are literally on the water, and the building was constructed onto stilts which were embedded into the lake's floor, so when guests go out onto the balcony they can enjoy the view and the breeze coming off the lake," said Marianne Corigliano, director of business development for Dynamic Hospitality and Entertainment Group, which owns Atlantis Pavilions.

Westin Prince

- ☐ Fully Kosher Facility
- ☐ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☐ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☐ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☐ 100-300 Person Capacity
- ☐ Over 300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Wheelchair Accessible

"When you look at Atlantis you have this remarkable view that will add so much to your special event – it's all about the unique location."

Atlantis Pavilions on Lake Ontario.

Last year, Atlantis completed a $5-million renovation, which transformed its 17,000-square-foot venue into a high-end events space. Each one of the four ballrooms was redone to include floor-to-ceiling windows, for an inviting view of Lake Ontario. The renovation includes brand-new bars, new wallpaper and new carpeting, and video screens were installed to boost the whole entertainment experience.

The Metropolitan, Atlantis Pavilions' main ballroom can hold up to 350 people for dinner and dancing, and also features a mezzanine level where company can be entertained with appetizers and cocktails before the main event. In addition, Atlantis Pavilions has a rooftop patio that can be used for receptions, where guests can sit under the stars and gaze at the moon's reflection on the lake.

Although the venue doesn't have a kosher kitchen, it does allow for outside kosher caterers to be used for events that require dietary accommodations.

Atlantis also offers its own delicious menu, served up by its creative catering team, that will satisfy your stomach and entice you to return for seconds.

If you're looking to escape the city without having to travel north, the Westin Prince Hotel is an excellent choice. The 34-year-old hotel at York Mills and Don Mills roads is in the midst of completing a $20-million renovation that includes a new lobby with fireplace and waterfall, front desk, restaurant and bar, and hotel entrance. A spa is due to be finished by 2009.

The Westin Prince has a 7,500-square-foot ballroom that can hold 450 people, as well as an outdoor garden that can accommodate a party of 150.

"When you walk into the Westin Prince, it gives you the impression of an urban resort, that we are a resort within the city," said Maria Chung, director of sales and marketing at the Westin Prince. "We are on 15 acres of parkland, so the atmosphere is very relaxing and the minute you walk into hotel you feel totally rejuvenated.

"The whole idea of the Westin experience is to give customers relaxation and rejuvenation, and the fact that we're on 15 acres of land allows for the customer to walk out to greenery and feel as though they're away from the city because of the surroundings the hotel provides."

For a dining experience, your guests will never forget, rely on the Westin's award-winning chef and the Superfood menu.

"The Westin, as a brand, is very much into health conscious food and we call it Superfood," said Chung. "A lot of our hotels are changing their menus to include Superfood like healthy, organic produce and low calorie dishes, and there are no transfats in our cooking, no processed foods, either."

The hotel is a non-kosher venue but does welcome outside catering for kosher events. Its events co-ordinator and catering manager specialize in Jewish functions, which makes it easy for clients to get what they're looking for and reasserts the Westin's philosophy of relaxation.

Other non-kosher venues advertising in this supplement are: Carmelina Restaurant, 905-477-7744; Casa Loma, 416-923-1171; CNIB, 416-486-2500; Estates of Sunnybrook, 416-487-3841; On The Park Events & Catering, 416-510-2002; The Fish House, 905-948-1982; Granite Club, 416-510-6676; The Hard Rock Cafe/Club 279, 416-362-3636; Hudson's Bay Catering/Arcadian Court, 416-861-6138; Karbouzi Mediterranean Bar & Grill, 416-483-3846; Liberty Group, 416-542-3789; The Lounge on Bayview/Factory, 416-787-5668; Maple Downs Golf Club, 905-832-0880x234; bypeterandpauls.com, 905-326-2000; Pickle Barrel, 416-990-5086; Scaramouche Restaurant/Pasta Bar, 416-961-8011; St. Andrew's Club & Conference Centre, 416-366-4228 or 1-800-267-7539; Taba's Restaurant, 416-636-0191; Toronto Marriott Downtown Eaton Centre, 416-597-9200.

Unique party venues for princesses or animal lovers

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Party guests literally get the royal treatment at the Princess Palace (905-660-2215), a birthday party venue in Concord (241 Edgeley Blvd. Unit 5) at Highway 7 and Jane Street.

The Princess Palace (www.princesspalace.ca) is a children's birthday party dress-up centre geared to boys and girls aged three to 12, explains co-owner Adriana Leone.

The children can choose different costumes, she says, noting that girls usually opt to be princesses, while the boys choose to be pirates, soldiers or knights.

The princess outfits are sized from infant to adult, she adds.

The two-hour-long parties begin with about an hour of dressing up, accessorizing and primping. Once the girls don their dresses, they add jewelry, flowers and shoes. The finishing touches include light makeup and nail polish. The boys go for accessories like swords and shields, and instead of makeup, they get face paint and temporary tattoos.

Then it's craft time. In keeping with the dress-up theme, the boys decorate crowns while the girls do tiaras. Once their attire is complete, the children put on a fashion show for the parents.

Of course no party is complete without food, and at Princess Palace, the children are served a royal feast on fine china. They get pizza, unlimited fruit and vegetables, and cheese and crackers.

Instead of carbonated beverages, the children drink apple juice, ice tea and/ or water.

Since the place is a peanut-free facility, no outside food is permitted, but themed cakes can be ordered through the palace. A special arrangement can be made for kosher parties as long as the food is peanut-free.

Carmela gets to be a little princess for a day at Princess Palace.

Leone recommends spa parties for girls 10 years and older. "Up to about 13 is ideal."

They get dressed up in robes and slippers and start their treatment with a hot face towel, before their facials, she says. "We use exfoliating masks with natural ingredients."

The girls get a light manicure and then they do meditation with cucumbers on their eyes.

All the parties come with two hosts, who attend to the children, helping them dress up and apply makeup or with the spa treatments, says Leone. "They make it fun and they keep the children well-entertained."

"It's a different atmosphere from other kinds of parties. It's very calm. The children love the makeup. They love getting pampered."

And the host parents get to relax, says Leone. "They don't have to bring anything, not even a candle. Just their camera and the birthday girl."

She adds that while the children are primping, parents have a room where they can enjoy complimentary coffee and socialize with each other.

The starting price of the parties is $285 for 11 children. This price includes invitations, food and a gift from The Princess Palace treasure box for the birthday child. Helium balloons, birthday cakes, loot bags and food platters for parents are extra. The price for a kosher birthday party is $250, without food.

Leone says there are a lot of repeat parties among friends because these parties are such a hit.

"The parents love it. They think it's so cute, and the kids see the party they want to have. They say, 'Mummy I want to have my party here.'"

For a different kind of party for people of all age groups, consider the Toronto Zoo. Communications supervisor Katie Gray (kgray@torontozoo.ca) recommends the private areas for large events like bar and bat mitzvahs or school or corporate parties. "We have a group-events co-ordinator who can arrange special events. (Debbie Forest 416-392-5940 or www.torontozoo.com/bookyourevent).

"We try to offer one-stop shopping. We have on-site catering. We do more than 90 parties a year. Our customer service is outstanding."

The spaces book up quickly, Gray says, noting that while most of the sites are outdoors, the atrium, which is available for $1,000 a day, is an indoor venue that can accommodate 80 to 100 people. "It's heated all year round. It's a popular place for weddings and we've also had a bar mitzvah there."

There are several private, outdoor picnic areas that are rented out from April to November.

Gray says the area near the African exhibits – the site can accommodate up to 250 people – is very much in demand and costs $300 for the day.

Parties at these designated private areas tend to cater to larger groups; the advantage of a private site is that animals can be brought to these parties, she says.

For $75 an hour, zoo keepers will bring animals like birds of prey or camels to the site. "They're all safe," laughs Gray. "We don't bring out the tigers."

Volunteers can also bring touch tables with artifacts like fur and bones, things that are part of the zoo's collection, she adds.

There is a discount on admission for groups of 20 or more and tickets for the Zoomobile ($7) can be arranged in advance.

Gray says renting picnic sites is not necessary for smaller birthday parties. "People can bring in their own food. We can work with you to arrange special visits. There are so many things that you can do.

"Rain or shine people have a unique experience here. All ages love it."

Princess Palace also has craft time. Boys decorate crowns and girls do tiaras.

Award-winning spa offers variety of treatments

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

If you are looking to get some well-deserved pampering, Stillwater Spa, located in the Park Hyatt in downtown Toronto, is a great place to make that happen.

"We have won lots of awards," said Alexandra Menear, public relations co-ordinator for the Park Hyatt. These include being named one of the top hotel spas in Canada and the United States by Travel + Leisure magazine.

Stillwater offers a wide variety of treatments to provide some escape from your busy everyday life. Warm Stone and Reiki massages, the signature Stillwater facial, and the Stillwater clay wrap are just some of their regular offerings, with new treatments introduced every few months.

Salon services are available, as are wedding packages for brides-to-be, which begin three months ahead of the wedding and end two days before with a relaxing massage.

With soothing waterfalls and streams and decor in neutral colours to promote relaxation, Stillwater Spa is an oasis in the middle of the city. Whether you have just an hour or a whole day, they have the perfect treatment to suit your lifestyle.

To find out more about Stillwater Spa, visit their website at www.stillwaterspa.com or call 416-925 1234 to set up your first appointment.

Shopping for the man of all seasons

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

For most men, shopping for clothing is bad enough – shopping for special occasion clothing is a nightmare. The waist is too tight, the jacket is too long and the tie doesn't match!

Thankfully though, if you know where to shop – these problems simply just do not exist. We daresay that shopping at either of these two stores is even a blast.

For more than 52 years and counting, Stars Men's Shops (www.starsmenshops.com, 1-877-867-1404) has understood that looking your best doesn't mean you have to spend, spend, spend.

Boasting 20 locations, including two factory stores, across Ontario, the now third-generation family-run business has come a long way from its modest beginnings as a dry cleaning service in Kitchener, Ont.

"My grandfather started bringing in zoot suits in the '40s and pretty soon people were coming to him for the hottest fashion," says John Strauss, the company's CEO.

Whether you are looking to get suited up for a special occasion or for a sophisticated nine to five wardrobe, Stars is the source for fashion and affordability. With suits starting at $149 and designer collections such as Calvin Klein and Kenneth Cole starting at $299, Stars will ensure that you can get it all without breaking the bank.

To compliment the wide array of suiting are Stars' selection of dress shirts, ties and other accessories. They are hand-picked and colour-matched by staff to ensure that a harmonious look can be achieved.

"Our knowledgeable and friendly consultants are empathetic, caring and will make sure you feel comfortable and, most importantly, that you are happy," says Strauss.

While sizing offered in the store ranges from 32-short to 52-tall, most locations have tailors on hand to make sure that further customization can be made.

"At Stars, we are passionate about making men look their best," says Strauss. "We believe that when you look good, you feel good and you do good."

Another tried-and-true approach to quality menswear is Saul Korman's. He owns Korry's, at 569 Danforth Ave. (www.korrys.com). Korry's has offered the best in high-end designer formal and casual menswear for 56 years.

"Although we've moved three times, we've always stayed on the same street," says Korman. "I just love the area. I love the people."

Korman's welcoming and relaxed tone has set the store apart from the otherwise stuffy stereotype of high-end retailing. "Customers often stop in to chat as often as they do to shop for a new suit," says Korman.

As well as a long list of notable clientele, including the likes of Breakfast Television's Kevin Frankish and politician John Tory, just to name a few, Korman has received a number of awards, including the lifetime achievement award by the men's retail trade magazine, MR, earlier this year.

Korry's is home to a number of well-known European names such as Hugo Boss and Canali (recently worn by U.S. president-elect Barack Obama), as well as such Canadian labels as Coppley and Korry's signature label, Roberto.

With a staff of professional consultants at hand to assist you in every aspect of wardrobe co-ordination and maintenance, as well as an on-site tailor to make on-the-spot alterations, Korry's is a one-stop shop for all your dressing needs.

"Simply put, we want to make the customer feel good," Korman says.

Turning memories into movies

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

As time goes by, photographs that were once pristine begin to fade with age, and those VHS tapes or slide shows filled with memories can get damaged and stop working. Before that can happen, FEF Films is here to help.

Ben Feferman, the executive director of FEF Films, started the company in July 2007 to help people preserve their memories in DVD format. He got the idea thanks to two years of taking college students on trips to Israel. At the end of each trip he would make a slide show of photos and videos.

"This is one of the most original gifts you can give to someone," he said. "It means more to them than any [other] gift."

In about a day, Feferman can take your precious memories and turn them into a polished movie, complete with captions and music.

Not only does Feferman put movies together, he also films them in his role as a documentary filmmaker. His current project is The Wandering Jew, looking at why Jewish people are going to India to find themselves spiritually. He hopes to have it completed by next summer.

Feferman believes the key to putting together a great movie is not about having technical prowess, or getting a degree from the best school. It's about telling stories in a compelling way.

"Film is storytelling," he said. "It is one of the best and most important ways to tell a story."

To have Feferman put his storytelling skills to work for you, contact him at 647-938-2474 or bfeferman@aish.com.

Kids' clothing: from runway to reality

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Before the kids are into ripped jeans and baggy sweatshirts, you get to make the choices when you shop for your little ones – in the same way as you shop for yourself.

And in a world where ballet tutus are acceptable for school and power suits are frowned upon, it's easy to get lost in the shuffle! Where can you go to find everything you and your little one desire? Well, we've got the perfect place.

Bon Lieu (www.bonlieu.com, 416-963-9703), 890 Yonge St., offers an extensive selection of high-end children's clothing at affordable prices. Carrying such quality lines as Michael Kors, Juicy Couture and Miss Sixty, Bon Lieu is stocked with clothes that suit the gym as well as the runway. And come January, Bon Lieu will be home to even more designer labels, including Burberry, Escada, DKNY and Kenzo, carrying children's sizes 0-16 as well as adult sizes to 4.

"We have mommy sizes too!" Lucia Araujo of Bon Lieu says with a laugh. "We think of ourselves as a one-stop-shop." And with services such as a baby registry, long-distance delivery and trial take-home, that's quite an understatement!

Bon Lieu not only offers a vast selection of clothes, but also has friendly staff who are knowledgeable about the different lines carried in the store.

By now, you must be thinking about the high prices at Bon Lieu, but don't be deceived. Although the store carries higher-end clothing, there is something there for everyone! With classic T-shirts starting at under $20, there are plenty of bargains to be had.

Araujo cites eggplant, grey and black as the most popular shades of the season, while spunky lines such as Diesel favour a brighter use of purple. As for style? Layering, layering, layering!

"I love to see how the children express their originality in the clothes" Araujo says.

Whatever the occasion, whether it is bar or bat mitzvah, graduation or a night out on the town, you will find what you need for your children at Bon Lieu and ensure that your children look their best on their most special of days.

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

You've got the groom, the dress, the date – now all you need is the shoes. You'll need something affordable, comfortable and downright gorgeous. But where in the world would you ever find a pair like that?

Well, lucky for you, Celebration Shoes at 106 Yorkville Ave. (www.celebrationshoes.com; 416-703-2789) has just about every pair you could possibly dream up and more.

With a background in design, Carma Saunderson started the business from her dining room table more than 18 years ago, after seeing similar ideas in her native England.

"It was all about the dress, but there were never any shoes to complete the look," she says.

After opening a store on King Street in Toronto, Saunderson moved the store into the heart of Toronto's most sophisticated fashion district – Yorkville. But don't let the swanky address stop you – Celebration shoes start at just over $100.

"Just because we're in Yorkville doesn't mean we are expensive," says Saunderson.

With a full stock of satin and silk shoes in store, Celebration can create a unique look for each customer. Once a pair is chosen, any embellishment you choose can be added to your shoe.

"I love playing with all the little trinkets and findings that make a shoe stand out," says Saunderson.

While most models come in white and ivory, they can be custom-dyed to match whatever colour is chosen, which is perfect for wedding parties. "It's also bonus for brides because they can bring their shoes back to be dyed, so they can wear them for long after the wedding" she says.

And while Celebration is all about creating your fantasy look, Saunderson swears by the practicality of her shoes. "Above all, they must be comfortable" she says. "The last thing you want to worry about on your wedding night is painful shoes."

To ensure that you make the right shoe choice, Celebration's friendly and knowledgeable staff will guide you through the customization process step by step.

"Customer service is our priority because we love what we do," says Saunderson. "The greatest thank you for us is that the customer leaves happy!"

Along with the wide array of shoes, Celebration carries a selection of local accessory lines, including Baubles jewelry and Laura Jane hair accessories. "We like to keep everything home-grown" says Saunderson.

Whether you are looking for the shoes to complete your wedding look or simply for a special occasion, it's safe to say that Celebration Shoes truly is your one-stop-shop. From sophisticated to sexy and spunky Celebration can make your fantasy a reality!

Stage West's medi-spa offers skin-rejuvenation packages

Many of the celebrities who have played the theatre and called Stage West home during their stays, including TV sitcom actors Loretta Swit, Joyce deWitt, Jaime Farr, John O'Hurley and Cloris Leachman, have partaken of the spa/clinic's offerings.

Spa Life
By Kathryn Kates

Owner/operator Hazel Currie feels fortunate to have been part of the Stage West environment since the hotel opened 19 years ago

"Our business is split. Within Stars, is Lezah Skincare – it is a medi-spa clinic where we strictly do rejuvenation and anti-aging treatments. The other half is Stars Beauty Centre, dedicated to full-day spa esthetics, including shiatsu, hot rock massage and Swedish massage, pedicures, manicures, makeup and basic facials," says Hazel Currie, a medical esthetician by trade.

The spa/clinic has two hairstylists, two estheticians and one massage therapist. The four treatment rooms, with Mediterranean décor with tropical touches, include a salon and reception-retail area. The massage facility is located in the hotel's concourse, in a quiet room away from the bustling salon.

Most of the spa's clients are local, coming from the surrounding businesses, 15 per cent are residents of the hotel, especially weekend guests looking for rest and relaxation, with 40 per cent of the total clientele being men.

The spa offers pampering-type packages and gift certificates, which are especially popular during holidays. Also available are medi-spa packages that relate to skin rejuvenation and custom-designed treatment packages depending on wants and needs.

"Over the years we have changed, but it was not a deliberate change," says Currie. "It was a change that was made by the guidance of our clients. Most of my clients are baby boomers. Eleven years ago, they were asking for certain anti-aging treatments that they were finding mostly at their dermatologist's office or their plastic surgeon, like photofacials and laser hair removal. Being their longtime esthetician, they were asking me if I was going to offer these services.

"My husband and business partner, David Currie, and I really had a choice to make. To make the switch was a huge investment in equipment, but we felt our clientele could afford these services. We took the chance and started introducing some of these technologies. The first technology we brought in was laser hair removal and then we added to that as the years went by. I feel that the last 10 years in this industry have been the most exciting for me as a medical esthetician using these progressive technologies," she says.

"We do laser hair removal, photofacials for firming, and anti-aging using the Intense Pulse Lighting IPL. We also use IPL technology for photo-rejuvenation, sun damage, roscacea, acne and hair removal. We also offer microdermabrasion, Beyond White Spa – a teeth-whitening system using a cool light – and endermology for cellulite. We combine technologies using IPL, micro-currents, ultrasound and microdermabrasion, along with cosmeceuticals – intended to improve skin's health."

Products used at the spa and/or retailed there include the Israeli lines Shira and Christina; Hylunia from Germany; C Line from Jordan; Adeeva, a vitamin line from Canada; Pharmagel from the United States; OPI nail products and Redken hair products from the United States; and the Stars, private label makeup.

Stage West All-Suite Hotel & Theatre is owned by Howard Peche, a California-based Jewish hotelier and the theatre's executive producer. The hotel boasts 224 tastefully designed suites, a Las Vegas-style dinner theatre and a giant indoor water slide. It was recently named hotel of the year by the Greater Toronto Hotel Association in the smaller-hotel category. Suites come with either a luxurious double Jacuzzi in the bedroom or a kitchenette – perfect for those bringing their own kosher meals during their stay.

Stage West, just 25 minutes from Toronto's Pearson International Airport, offers an array of packages to suit couples, business travellers or families. Packages often include a fun night of theatre, accommodation and much more, separate from the spa/clinic's packages.

For an appointment at Stars Beauty Centre, visit www.starsbeautycentre.com or call 905-602-1295. For Lezah Skincare Clinic, visit www.lezah.ca or call 905-602-4632. To make theatre reservations, visit www.stagewest.com or call 905-238-0159.

Bridal registries: 'not just a girl thing'

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

With couples frequently marrying later in life, bridal registries are more important than ever, says Jackie Chiesa of William Ashley China (www.williamashley.com; 416-964-2900).

"They've already been living on their own, already established households. Guests are at a complete loss: 'What do I get for this couple that's special?'

"A wedding gift is not like buying a birthday gift, a once-a-year opportunity; it's symbolic of that specific event… People want to give something that's cherished."

Years ago, Chiesa says, the typical bride registering with Ashley was either leaving home for the first time or marrying straight out of university. She usually came in with her mother, who offered much-needed direction to the "green" bride. "She didn't know what she needed – a platter, a coffee pot."

Today, Chiesa's seeing far more mature "couples who are joining together, who have a definite idea of what they want." And today's guys are not being dragged along, they're active participants. "It's not just a girl thing."

Men are often drawn to the full range of gourmet kitchenware, the gadgets and innovative kitchenware like garlic presses and knives, offered in the relaxed setting of the gourmet shop.

"I have grooms coming in, saying, 'I don't even let her in the kitchen – I do all the cooking,'" Chiesa says. "They're mixing the martinis, making sushi in the kitchen, while she's out there entertaining the guests."

But they're not just coming in for the toys, Chiesa insists. "Men are active in participating in the process of co-ordinating the tabletop, too… they have just as much to say about it as she does."

That process is what Ashley is perhaps best known for. It has been in the business of bridal registries since they first became popular in the 1970s, and a couple registering for the first time is given all the help they need to find tableware that won't gather dust.

"We want them to use it and enjoy it – pull it out on a daily basis."

While many have some idea of their own taste, the vast selection of merchandise can initially feel overwhelming. "Most couples want direction and guidance, like understanding the difference between bone china and porcelain, or why this decoration is more costly than this pattern and this decoration," Chiesa says.

They may also want to build a collection that includes pieces they've already acquired or heirlooms handed down through the generations, like a grandmother's beloved sterling flatware. Sales associates train for weeks to be able to assist in incorporating these items at the modern dinner table.

"We work with couples who have partial sets, things that have been passed along, that are sentimental."

> Technology makes registering easier than ever

Technology has made registering easier than ever. Once couples have met with a consultant to choose core tableware items, they can walk around the store with the Wishpad, a sophisticated scanner that lets them add gifts to their registry according to personal taste. "You can even go online with it, check your e-mail, use Google," says Chiesa. "The gentlemen love it."

The complete registry is also available online, which means guests from out of town can choose gifts at their own convenience, day or night, and order them online or via a toll-free number. When a gift is purchased from the registry, a gift card is mailed to the couple, but Ashley also maintains a complete database of which items have been purchased.

Most gifts will be delivered together at some point after the wedding – there's even a "green" delivery service, which eliminates packing materials – but a guest can also shop from the registry in person at Ashley's Bloor Street West store.

Couples often worry about including a range of gifts for every guest's budget. "There's a wide variety of price available on the registry – maybe just a hostess gift, or for a bachelorette party. Every guest feels comfortable… getting a beautiful gift.

"We want them to be comfortable, not only for themselves, but also for their guests."

Ashley stocks gift items ranging from $10 to $25 and up.

"Being on Bloor Street is a negative sometimes," Chiesa says. "People assume we're affiliated with the high-end stores around us. We have items in every price point.

"No doubt, it is a gorgeous store… we have beautiful fixtures; we want the whole experience to be nice for customers… people assume they're paying more for the beautiful environment."

But even at the higher end, "William Ashley has incredible buying power… we undersell the department stores 365 days a year and guests are getting the best possible price for those place settings.

"We offer free gift boxing, with our beautiful gold signature gift box," Chiesa says.

Thirty years ago, Chiesa admits there may have been a stigma to registering – "how presumptuous of the couple to make a list of the gifts they want."

Just as men have changed over the last 30 years to become more involved in the process of registering and have fun doing it, today's guests are different, too. These days, most are grateful for a registry like Ashley's that helps them easily share in the celebration in a meaningful way.

"When [couples] walk out, they are so enthused… they spread the news to all their guests: 'These are things I love that I am going to use and enjoy.'"

Canadians mourn Mumbai victims

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish communities have begun to formally pay tribute to the victims of terrorism in Mumbai.

A standing room-only crowd estimated at almost 1,500 people gathered at the headquarters of Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario in Thornhill on Sunday afternoon for an hour-long service in memory of Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg and his wife, Rivkah, the young Chabad shluchim (emissaries) who were killed by terrorists in Mumbai last week.

In Montreal, Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, planned a vigil for the victims of the Mumbai attacks that was to be held Monday night at the Gelber Conference Centre.

At Chabad Lubavitch of Markham just north of Toronto, Rabbi Avraham Plotkin organized a "Solidarity Shabbos" as part of Saturday morning services.

On Friday, the day the Holtzbergs' deaths were confirmed, Rabbi Plotkin told The CJN that Jews don't mourn on Shabbat, but that his congregation would "stand in solidarity with our brethren in Mumbai." He said he would encourage congregants to take on a mitzvah such as attending a class, putting on tfillin or affixing a mezuzah.

"The terrorists are trying to destroy what's good in the world, and we're trying to bring more good into the world," he said, his voice heavy with sadness.

On Sunday at the memorial service, Rabbi Zalman Aaron Grossbaum, executive director of Chabad in Ontario, brought a similar message. "We encourage everybody to channel their pain… into acts of kindness," he told an audience that included municipal, provincial and federal political representatives, and a representative of Israel's consulate in Toronto, who spoke in Hebrew as part of the program.

Terrorists targeted Jews, Israelis in attacks

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — The only Mumbai terrorist caught alive told an Indian newspaper that he and his colleagues were sent to target Israelis.

Azam Amir Kasab, a Pakistani, told Indian police that the terrorists targeted the Chabad outreach centre, known as the Nariman House, because it was frequented by Israelis, the Times of India reported Sunday. Israelis were targeted to "avenge atrocities on Palestinians," the paper reported Kasab as saying.

The Times also quoted a source as saying that some of the terrorists killed in the operation had earlier rented rooms at the Nariman House, identifying themselves as Malaysian students, in order to study the building.

"There is no doubt that these attacks were designed, inter alia, to intentionally harm such Jewish institutions," Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told his cabinet Sunday. "The government of Israel is doing, and will continue to do, everywhere, what needs to be done to protect Jewish institutions insofar as the matter depends on us and is possible, in the very special circumstances related to events of this kind."

Olmert praised the Indian government and military for their response to the attacks on 10 sites in Mumbai, which killed more than 170 people and left hundreds injured. Five Israelis were confirmed killed in the Chabad centre.

Olmert said Sunday that he was briefed frequently by security and intelligence officials who were "in close touch with the Indian government."

The News in Brief

Canada

Babi Yar Recalled

OTTAWA — Citizenship Minister Jason Kenney returned to Canada last week after visiting the site of the Babi Yar massacre in Kiev, part of a trip to Ukraine to mark 75 years since a famine that killed millions. More than 33,000 Jews were killed by the Nazis at Babi Yar on Sept. 29 and 30, 1941, and more than 100,000 Jewish and non-Jewish victims are said to be buried there.

Shul Moves To Park

CALGARY — A historic frontier shul was moved to a Calgary park last week. The Montefiore Institute was transferred Nov. 26 from its restoration site east of Calgary to a waiting foundation on the south side of Heritage Park, in its Historical Village. The one-room shul measures just 7.5 by 13 metres and was built in 1913 to serve a small Jewish farming community near Sibbald, on the Saskatchewan border east of Calgary. The community later disbanded because of drought, and the shul was sold and moved in 1940 to Hanna, Alta., where it was a private home for more than 60 years. The shul is being restored by the Little Synagogue on the Prairie Project, which has painted it yellow, its original colour. Its interior will be renovated over the winter and opened to visitors in June.

Iraqi MP Acquitted

BAGHDAD — An Iraqi lawmaker was acquitted of a crime for visiting Israel. An Iraqi court ruled Nov. 24 that Mithal al-Alusi didn't break Iraqi law when he visited Israel in September to attend a counterterrorism conference, Reuters reported. He used a German passport to travel to Israel, which he has visited several times in recent years. Iraq's parliament voted to strip him of his immunity from prosecution and charged him with visiting an enemy state, an offence from the 1950s that's punishable by death. The court ruled there's no law barring travel to Israel.

Religion Helps: Study

NEW YORK — Attendance at religious services reduces the risk of death by 20 per cent, a new study says. The study by researchers at Yeshiva University's Albert Einstein College of Medicine was published in the journal Psychology and Health. Researchers evaluated religious practices of 92,395 women aged 50 to 79 participating in the Women's Health Initiative, a national, long-term study on women's health. Those who said they attend services once a week or more showed a 20 per cent mortality risk reduction versus those not attending services at all. The study didn't try to measure spirituality. Rather, it examined self-reported measures of religiosity.

Cotler Reintroduces Sudan Boycott Bill

OTTAWA — Liberal MP and opposition human rights critic Irwin Cotler has reintroduced his Sudan Accountability Act, the first-ever legislation aimed at enhancing the role of Canada and the international community in combating the "genocide by attrition" in Darfur.

In tabling the bill Nov. 21, Cotler, the founder of the Save Darfur Parliamentary Coalition, noted, "It is only appropriate that, on the eve of the 60th anniversary of the Genocide Convention, legislation be introduced to combat the first genocide of the 21st century."

The proposed law provides for targeted divestment from Sudan and requires that government contractors certify they do not conduct business in Sudan.

In particular, the legislation instructs Canada to act in concert with the international community and the United Nations to pursue initiatives aimed at ending the genocide, including the effective deployment of the joint UN-African Union mission, the delivery of humanitarian aid, and the surrender of Sudanese involved in genocide to the International Criminal Court.

"We know that more than 400,000 have died in this genocide by attrition, that three million have been displaced and at least four million are on a life-support system," said Cotler. "As the student posters at Darfur rallies ask, 'If not us, who?' and 'If not now, when?'"

Doubting Durban II

SYDNEY — Australia is concerned that anti-Semitism could mar a United Nations conference on racism next year. A spokesperson for the Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade said last week that America, New Zealand and the European Union supported Australia's concern about the followup to the 2001 Durban conference against racism, which is scheduled for April in Geneva. The 2001 UN conference has been described by critics as an anti-Israel and anti-Semitic hate-fest. Israel and America walked out in protest during the conference. The spokesperson said Australia hasn't yet decided if it will attend the conference, dubbed "Durban II." He said that it depends "whether Australia, and other countries with a genuine interest in countering racism, can positively influence the outcomes of the [Durban II] conference." Canada and Israel have already withdrawn.

Muslims, Jews bond over Abraham

Synagogues, mosques take part in twinning

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Enthusiasm and goodwill pervaded a lively gathering of 100 Jews and Muslims, who met for an interfaith dialogue on Abraham and his place in their respective religious traditions.

The Sunday-morning brunch hosted by the Noor Cultural Centre in Don Mills capped a weekend of joint events held by the Noor centre and Temple Emanu-El in North York. Members of both groups had also attended Friday afternoon worship at the Noor centre and Kabbalat Shabbat and Shabbat services at the synagogue.

The program was part of a North American-wide initiative held on the weekend of Nov. 22, when the parshah of the week spoke of Isaac and Ishmael, the two older sons of Abraham, coming together for their father's burial.

Some 50 synagogues and 50 mosques in cities in Canada and the United States participated in a weekend of twinning initiated by Rabbi Marc Schneier, president of the New York-based Foundation for Ethnic Understanding.

Other twinnings of Islamic and Jewish institutions in the GTA included Solel Congregation and the Islamic Centre of Canada, in Mississauga; Temple Har Zion and the Jafari Cultural Centre, both in Thornhill; and Beth Torah Congregation in Toronto and the Lote Tree Foundation in Brampton. As well, Hamid Slimi of the Canadian Council of Imams spoke at Beth Tzedec Congregation on Shabbat.

The discussion of Abraham at the Sunday brunch at the Noor centre was co-lead by Prof. Timothy Gianotti, Noor Fellow at York University – he gave the Islamic interpretation – and Rabbi Debra Landsberg, spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-El.

Scholarship established for Moshe Holtzberg

Chabad has established a scholarship fund for the Holtzbergs' two-year-old son, Moshe, who was rescued by his nanny, Sandra Samuel. The organization is also raising money to rebuild Mumbai's Chabad House.

Rabbi Grossbaum said a second Chabad couple who were scheduled to join the Holtzbergs as shluchim have already left for Mumbai to continue their work there.

David Koschitzky, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, told the gathering that the memorial service was a message to the world about "the remarkable selflessness, decency and goodness that Chabad represents, as personified by Rabbi Gavriel and Rivkah Holtzberg."

The couple and other victims of the terrorists did not die in vain, he added. Terrorists "can murder decent people, but they can't destroy decency," Koschitzky said.

As The CJN went to press Monday, the federation was planning a solidarity rally for this Sunday together with the Indo-Canadian community. Details should be available mid-week at www.jewishtoronto.com.

Rabbi Yossi Gansburg, educational director of Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario, expressed "heartfelt sympathies" and condolences to families and friends of all the victims – "hundreds of innocent people."

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith, said that those who believe in democracy must stand together.

He added that Chabad House was not the "unlikely target" it was said to be in early reports of the tragedy. "No Christians, no Hindus, no Buddhists, no moderate Muslims and no Jews are safe from Islamic terrorism."

Terror in Mumbai

Rabbi Immanuel Schochet, a former professor of philosophy at Humber College and a senior Chabad leader, said, in reference to other Jewish denominations, that this is "surely a time when all Jews regardless of personal beliefs sense an intrinsic unity that binds us together."

Rabbi Mendel Kaplan of Chabad @ Flamingo, in an emotional address on behalf of all Chabad shluchim in Ontario, said the news of the Holtzbergs' murder, as well as the loss of the other victims, "has shattered our spirits."

But, he vowed on behalf of his colleagues, "We will do not twice as much but 10 times as much to increase the amount of light in the world."

Tour group shaken by Mumbai attacks

Ann Samson and 19 other Torontonians who returned together from a trip to India Nov. 20 were especially shaken by the recent attacks in Mumbai.

"It was horrifying," Samson said in an interview on Sunday, referring to the multi-pronged terrorist attack. "The whole group was very upset. Our whole trip has been overshadowed by this awful event."

Samson, a retired educator who immigrated to Canada with her husband, Solomon, in 1966, led the recent tour, which included five days in Mumbai to meet the Jewish community.

The group stayed at the Trident Oberoi, one of the two targeted hotels. "It's a gorgeous hotel," Samson said. "The staff was warm, very helpful, very kind, and they looked after us really well."

Among other members of Mumbai's Jewish community, the group met a friend of Samson's who owns a shop at the Oberoi. By sheer luck, the friend had closed her store 15 minutes early to take another friend to the airport on the day the terrorists struck, Samson said.

She was unharmed, as were the group's tour guide – a member of Mumbai's Bene Israel community – and other friends from Samson's school days and community members whom she was able to contact.

Samson's group spent Shabbat morning at Mumbai's Keneseth Eliyahoo Synagogue, where Rabbi Holtzberg, the Chabad shaliach who was killed, was among the worshippers and gave the dvar Torah.

Samson had met the Holtzbergs on a previous trip and recalls them as "very warm" people.

A founding member of Congregation Bina – Toronto's Indian Jewish congregation with more than 100 families (although some are not from the Toronto area) – Samson said she would encourage travellers not to cancel plans to visit India.

"You can't allow these people to scare us. It's the same as going to Israel. Life goes on… If you're scared and do not go, then they've won."

The main contenders

From the editor's desk

Israel is in the midst of an election campaign. A national vote is slated for Feb. 10, 2009. As a result, the country is a live wire of political electricity, twitching and crackling with every movement and statement of its political figures.

During the last week of November, when these observations were made, the major parties were still recruiting candidates. Newspapers, television and radio stations were high-volume bullhorns incessantly blaring partisan information, rumour, innuendo, accusation and calumny at an equally partisan, but curiously attentive, public.

Of the three main parties, the Likud, under the leadership of former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, was leading in the polls, and by a significant margin. This was the case even though more Israelis seemed to prefer Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, the leader of the Kadima party, to be their prime minister. The Kadima party was second in pre-election polling. The once-vaunted Labor Party had fallen very far in voter esteem. The party was not expected to win more than 10 seats in the 120-seat Knesset. Its leader, former prime minister and current Defence Minister Ehud Barak, was publicly derided more often and with greater malice, it seemed to this observer, than the other leaders.

Tzipi Livni

Netanyahu and Livni are the two main contenders in the election. Each addressed the United Jewish Communities General Assembly on its last day.

Netanyahu held the 3,000 or so mostly American delegates spellbound. He is an impressive public speaker, especially to an English-language audience from America.

He is a masterful orator. Having spent a large portion of his youth in the United States, he sounds American when he speaks, and this resonates especially well with an American audience.

He used the opportunity of the large audience, which he knew would also attract local Israeli media attention, to spell out the key pillars of his platform.

In foreign policy, Netanyahu proposes to achieve security by continuing bilateral peace talks with the Palestinians while at the same time "weav[ing] an economic peace alongside the political talks."

The Likud leader said the current all-or-nothing approach to peace negotiations with the Palestinians is doomed to fail and thus increase the level of frustration on the part of Palestinians.

He wants to establish economic growth for ordinary Palestinians to enable the Palestinian Authority to counter Hamas claims of success and accusations of PA failure. "We should separate the security needs of Israel from the economic needs of the Palestinians. Economic peace is not a substitute for political peace. It facilitates political peace."

Benjamin Netanyahu

Netanyahu said he has a plan, the general outline of which he had already discussed with U.S. president-elect Barack Obama, that would "generate rapid economic growth for the Palestinians in the West Bank."

Helping the Palestinians' attain some measure of economic success, Netanyahu is convinced, will eventually bring bilateral political success.

On domestic policy, Netanyahu stood on very precise planks for dealing with the fallout from the global economic crisis, stanching the "explosion of crime" and improving the faltering education system.

Livni does not sound like an American. Yet she, too, received a warm, generous response from the audience. The spotlight and the camera like her.

She did not, however, deliver a campaign speech aimed at perking the ears of Israeli voters. Rather, she spoke about the need to ensure the right of Israel to exist as a Jewish state as a prior condition for Israelis and Jews stepping out into the world to undertake tikkun olam, the subject of the session at which she had been invited to speak.

The importance of Israel as a Jewish state was one of Livni's key messages. "Jewishness, however, was a matter of values, not of numbers and it was not a monopoly of certain rabbis. The nature of the character of the State of Israel must be Jewish because this is the raison d'etre of the state," Livni said to a long burst of applause.

Moreover, Livni emphasized, the world must acknowledge Israel's right to exist "as a Jewish state," as U.S. President George W. Bush had done from the podium of the United Nations General Assembly.

She then announced Israel would not participate in the upcoming Durban II anti-racism conference, because it was now certain with the release of the preparatory documents by the United Nations that the conference would be a hate-filled forum for the demonization of the Jewish state. (Canada said last year that it would boycott the conference.)

She called on the international community not to participate in the conference.

The two contenders were very impressive.

See]N CELEBRATING 60 YEARS OF ISRAEL

BUILDER OF A NATION

On Dec. 1, 1973, Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, died after a long, illustrious career. Born in Poland in 1886, he came to Palestine in 1906, when it was an Ottoman Turkish province. Before Israeli statehood in 1948, he was a founder of the Histadrut trade union and the Mapai party, which later become the Labor party. He led Israel through the War of Independence and was instrumental in building the country. He spent his last years at Sde Boker, a kibbutz in the Negev. Here, Ben-Gurion, in white hat, reviews a military parade in Jerusalem in 1950. With him in the front row is Israeli president Chaim Weizmann, middle, and the chief of staff, Gen. Yigal Yadin, right.

Jewish Archives acquires rabbi's records

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi David Monson – the founding rabbi of Beth Sholom Synagogue, who died in July at age 91 – began keeping a daily "diary" in the late 1940s.

The hardcover books, which detail his daily appointments and include clippings and brief notes, provide insight into the rabbi's life and the life of Toronto's Jewish community in bygone days. Recently, the rabbi's daughter, Judith Waldman, donated the diaries and other Monson memorabilia to the Ontario Jewish Archives.

"They're really fascinating," said archives director Ellen Scheinberg, referring specifically to the diaries and marriage registry books, which date back to 1939.

The page-a-day diaries were available only in New York, and "whoever was [travelling]" would bring them for the rabbi every year, recalled Waldman in a phone interview.

She said her father – who began his career as spiritual leader in northern Ontario communities and from 1939 to 1943 at Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation – liked to cut and paste quotes into the diaries. "He probably used them for a sermon later on. I couldn't find all his sermons, but the archives got what I could find."

As well, she said, he kept notes on single men and women he met so that he could make matches between them.

"We're fortunate to have this collection here," Scheinberg said, adding that some rabbis have taken local records with them when they moved to another community. There are other journals in the archives' collection, but "not too many" from rabbis.

"And Rabbi Monson was such a popular rabbi," Scheinberg added. He was known as "the people's rabbi," a designation that appears on at least one award that is in the collection.

A founder of the former Northwestern Hospital, Rabbi Monson was involved with many organizations and institutions, most notably Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem.

His marriage registry books are "important genealogical records" that include details not found in a ketubah, such as the brides' and grooms' home addresses, occupations, and their mothers' maiden names, Scheinberg said.

Leafing through an early marriage registry, Scheinberg noted that one bride was listed as a divorcee, a rarity in those days.

Even the older registries are not likely to appear online, because they contain personal information about people who may still be alive, said Scheinberg. However, she noted, "we can provide information to direct relatives."

Items that have been donated to the archives are preserved in acid-free folders and boxes and kept in an environmentally controlled environment.

During an interview last week, a few items from the Monson collection shared space on a large table with an x-acto knife, small mallet, pliers and screwdriver – tools that would be used by volunteers to release some of the donated documents from their existing frames.

Waldman gave a total of 10 boxes to the archives. She hopes the donation will enable people to learn from her father's life, she said. "He was such a community person, the community should also benefit."

Other items of her father's are going to Beth Sholom, and to York University's Centre for Jewish Studies.

Previous donations can be found in the Library and Archives of Canada, where Scheinberg was trained and worked for 10 years as an archivist. There is a also a display case dedicated to Rabbi Monson's stint as a Jewish army chaplain as part of a Jewish War Veterans' display at the Lipa Green Building.

Terror in Mumbai

Last week's horrific terrorist incident in Mumbai, the commercial and cultural hub of India, reminds us yet again that Israel is hardly the only country that suffers from this endemic scourge. Indeed, terrorism, which flouts the norms of civilized behaviour, crosses global borders. No cause, however, worthy, can resort to terrorism. It is simply beyond the pale. The barbarians who wreaked havoc in Mumbai killed and wounded hundreds of innocent civilians and sowed fear and panic throughout that great, cosmopolitan city. When it was finally over, six Jews, including Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg and his wife, Rivka, were among the dead. In perpetrating such heinous acts, the terrorists demonstrated that they have no respect whatsoever for human life and should be treated accordingly. The tragedy in Mumbai underscores the fact that such debased acts must be relentlessly combated, and that the international community should join forces to fight them.– S.K.

Architect of a Nation

David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first and longest-serving prime minister, was one of the founding fathers of the Jewish state. A strong and outspoken secular nationalist, he was a champion of the Jewish people until his death on Dec. 1, 1973. Thirty five years on, Ben-Gurion's legacy and lustre have hardly dimmed. Both a visionary and a realist, he pursued pragmatic policies in the service of a nation besieged by enemies and burdened by problems. "The difficult we do immediately," he declared. "The impossible takes a little longer." Clearly, he was a man who believed in miracles.

Settling in Palestine to build Zionism and to be rebuilt by it, he evolved into a stellar figure in the labour Zionist movement, founding the Histadrut, the Jewish trade union, and playing an integral role in the establishment of the Mapai party, the precursor of the Labor party. As chair of the Jewish Agency from 1935 until 1948, he displayed leadership and a remarkable grasp of realpolitik. He supported the Peel Commission's recommendation for partitioning Palestine and backed the British during the seminal struggle against Nazi totalitarianism, the craven 1939 White Paper on immigration notwithstanding. Betting that the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition proposal was a unique historic opportunity, he rallied the Jewish world behind it. On May 14, 1948, Ben-Gurion declared statehood, knowing full well that Arab armies stood poised to invade and destroy Israel. During the War of Independence, he exhibited courage, strength of character and endurance. With Israel a reality, he presided over its fortunes from 1948 to 1953 and again from 1955 to 1963. At his direction, vital institutions were built, waves of immigrants were absorbed, the Negev Desert was developed, the National Water Carrier was constructed, rural development projects were undertaken, the armed forces were strengthened, a reparation agreement with West Germany was signed, and national legitimacy was enhanced by the adoption of a pro-western orientation in foreign policy. Ben-Gurion fell far short of his goal of making peace with the Arabs, but in the often rancorous debate over territory in the aftermath of the Six Day War, he warned that Israel would be better off without the Palestinian territories, a view now widely regarded as conventional wisdom. The final chapter of Ben-Gurion's distinguished career was marred by the intrigues of the Lavon Affair and petty politics. But the majority of Israelis recognized him as the architect of Israel's statehood. – S.K.

25 years ago in The CJN

Controversy erupted in Israel over the exuberant welcome given to six PoWs released by the Palestinians. President Chaim Herzog said the soldiers had "shamefully" surrendered to the PLO in Lebanon in 1982, and he compared the reception they got to the muted one given to freed PoWs from the Yom Kippur War. As well, questions were raised about releasing 4,500 Palestinian and Lebanese men in exchange for six Israelis.

She would be one of the first to denounce similar collective aspersions against the Jewish community for controlling western finances or the foreign policy of the U.S. government. As well, in the same way, Zerker would complain against anti-Israel criticism that singles out Israel for some improper conduct if other countries engaged in similar conduct were not criticized, she commits a similar offence for singling out the left for "backing the wrong horse." The right and even the centre have been guilty of the same conduct. A few examples include the backing of Iraq in the 1980s and then invading Iraq two decades later, and backing the Argentine and Chilean generals.

Finally, why does Zerker limit herself to foreign policy issues? The right and the centre have proven themselves to be wrongheaded on domestic and economic issues, the highest-profile one being reliance on the correctness of the hidden hand of the free market. That ideology is being completely discredited by the economic meltdown currently taking place. Demonizing the left can only inhibit necessary interactions and efforts at mutual understanding between it and any ethnic, cultural or religious community.

The left in Israel

The left in Israel is co-operating with the Arabs to defame the pioneers of today's Israel in the West Bank.

The organization Peace Now, in Israel or abroad, would have credibility if it could forward the address of the stores that sell their imaginary peace.

I know of no Israeli who is not craving peace – a true peace, a peace that is built on educating generations of children to be tolerant, to accept others in the neighbourhood, and not to hate, as the Arabs in that part of the world do.

Avoiding reality and living in a dream world will bring only disasters.

One or two days of yom tov?

Gil Troy in his column "We should all turn toward Israel, (CJN, Oct. 30) decries the practice of Diaspora Jews visiting Israel who observe yom tov sheini shel galiyot, a second day of the festivals, at a time when observant Israelis go back to work. He claims this practice is absurd and diminishes the holiness of the Land of Israel. The Land of Israel is inherently holy and cannot be sullied by visitors keeping an extra day of yom tov.

The Chacham Tzvi did write that a tourist should observe only one day when in Israel. However, the bulk of rabbinic opinion (Rabbi Yosef Karo, Rabbi Shlomo Zalman Auerbach, the Chazon Ish, the Mishnah Brurah and Rabbi Moshe Feinstein) did not accept this argument. They wrote that one must keep two days, and throughout Jewish history, this has been the accepted practice.

Why does Troy condemn those who follow the majority halachic opinion? It is unfortunate that we are not all united in our observance of the festivals, but that is the result of our sins, as we (Israelis included) say in the Musaf prayer of the festivals: "Because of our sins we have been exiled from our land."

The Silvermans from Cornwall

After reading Daniel Held's column "A gift that bridged two generations," CJN, Nov. 20), I realized my mother's family is truly unique. If I had a grandchild in Daniel's history class, he or she would be able to say that their great-great-grandmother was born in Cornwall, Ont., in 1893. My great-grandparents names were Jennie and Jacob Silverman. I do know they had a farm in Cornwall and moved to Montreal in their later years. If anyone from the Cornwall area remembers the family, I would be very happy to hear from them. I can be contacted by e-mail at jeabrahm@live.ca. My mailing address is 150 Connaught Ave., Toronto, M2M 1H4.

Recalling Ben-Gurion's two fateful decisions

Every fall at this time... the leaders of the State of Israel head south to this place, the burial plot of the architect of Israel's rebirth: David Ben-Gurion. Here, on this cliff overlooking the ancient vista of Nahal Tzin, where the "big shoulders of a generation," as the poet Natan Alterman so beautifully and succinctly put it, chose to be buried.

Here, in the presence of this spectacular and open desert landscape, Ben-Gurion asked to raise his final flag, with the word "Negba!" on it. And since then, all of us who have come after him stand here year after year at this place, near his headstone and his will, ashamed, because his vision was great and so little of it was realized.

The cases are rare in the history of a nation in which there was such an accurate and miraculous synergy between the right man and the right time. It is only at those crossroads at which the right leader meets the elusive, historic opportune moment, and the leaders know to strongly grasp the horns of history and divert it from its path.

David Ben-Gurion was the emissary of Jewish history at the fateful crossroads of our people between the Holocaust and the rebirth. It seems that the divine guiding force summoned and invited him to do so.

The time is too brief to list fully the great deeds of Ben-Gurion... who guided us and shaped the rebirth of Israel in its land: the War of Independence, the establishment of the [Israel Defence Forces], the ingathering of the exiles, the foundation for the state and its institutions. Therefore, I will make do with noting two points, two fateful decisions, without which the State of Israel would not be what it is today. And it is doubtful if it would even exist.

On May 12, 1948, two days before the end of the British Mandate, the members of the People's Administration – the embryonic government – gathered to decide whether to declare the establishment of the state or to avoid doing so.

In the background, there was the certainty that, immediately upon the declaration of the state, five enemy armies would immediately invade with the stated goal of drowning it in blood.

In the background was the memory of the Holocaust just three years previously, and the danger of losing the last safe haven for the Jewish people.

In the background was the fate of all that was built and established in the Jewish settlement of the Land of Israel through hard labour, sweat and blood over the preceding 50 years of Zionism.

In the background was the severe warning made by the American secretary of state, Gen. George Marshall, to the head of the yishuv's department of foreign affairs, Moshe Sharett, that there was no chance for a Jewish state, if it was declared, to survive the attack by the Arab armies surrounding it.

In the background was the opinion of the representative of the General Staff, the operations officer Yigael Yadin, that there was a 50-50 chance [that the yishuv would survive], but that the enemy had a great advantage.

And in the background, during the meeting itself, the cries of despair were heard from a besieged Gush Etzion under attack, which was conquered and ultimately fell with a heavy cost in blood.

Ben-Gurion knew that he did not have a guaranteed majority in the People's Administration to declare a state, but he had no intention of allowing this historic, opportune moment to slip away, despite the risks. He used the full force of his influence, he manipulated, he pressured and he ignored suggested compromises to declare a government but not a state.

Finally, he achieved his goal by one vote.

Two days later, the State of Israel was established.

Five regular Arab armies, equipped with heavy arms, immediately invaded our borders. But under David Ben-Gurion's leadership, the young Israel, against all odds, through sacrifice and supreme valour, withstood the attacks and succeeded.

The second fateful decision made by Ben-Gurion was regarding Jerusalem.

During the War of Independence, he granted supreme importance to ensuring the contiguity and totality of Hebrew Jerusalem in the borders of the State of Israel, in opposition to the UN Resolution [that purported to internationalize the city].

His decision to launch a complex and dangerous military operation to break through to Jerusalem – while risking other parts of the country due to the concentration of large forces for the operation – is only part of a long list of fateful decisions regarding the future of Jerusalem.

When the UN tried again in December 1949 to uproot Hebrew Jerusalem from the State of Israel in a second resolution regarding the internationalization of the city, Ben-Gurion decided to face the world head on. While overcoming objections at home, Ben-Gurion immediately passed a government and Knesset resolution declaring Jerusalem to be the eternal capital of the State of Israel.

He declared: "Jewish Jerusalem is an organic and inseparable part of Israeli history, its faith and of the soul of our people. Jerusalem is the heart of the State of Israel. Israelis would give their lives for Jerusalem no less than British people would for London, Russians for Moscow and Americans for Washington."

The international response was furious. There were threats. There were boycotts. But Jerusalem the capital was an unshakeable and decisive fact, and it will remain so forever.

These are only two of the numerous historic and fateful decisions made by Ben-Gurion, and indeed they are engraved in letters of gold in the history of the days of Israel.

Fifty-five years ago, David Ben-Gurion spoke of the obligation of the prime minister – all prime ministers – of Israel to exhaust all chances for peace, but also to maintain security.

He said: "I would think it would be a grave sin not only toward our generation, but toward following generations, too, if we would not do everything possible in order to reach mutual understanding with our Arab neighbours, lest the following generations accuse the government of Israel of missing an opportunity for peace. I would not want to be the man whose grandchildren or great-great grandchildren accuse of having missed a chance for Jewish-Arab peace.

"However, together with the necessity and spiritual ability to be prepared for every opportunity for peace, we also command – because our lives depend on it – a constant readiness for war"

May the memories of David and Paula Ben-Gurion be blessed.

Revisiting Golda's life and times

Fighting wars and pursuing peace seem forever to have defined political leadership in Israel. Add to these nation building and you have the essence and the enormity of what characterized the life and times of Golda Meir, Israel's first, and so far only, female prime minister.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Elinor Burkett's biography of her feisty and always controversial subject, titled simply Golda (Harper Collins Publishers, 2008), is an easy and absorbing read. Exhaustively researched and elegantly written, Burkett focuses on more than just Meir's life. She also provides an insightful perspective on the existential turbulence that faced the Jewish state during the first three decades of its existence.

Meir was born in Kiev, Ukraine, but immigrated with her family to the United States in 1903. Her early years were spent in Milwaukee. As a teenager, she rebelled against her parents and ran away to live with her older sister in Denver. There she was exposed to what Burkett describes as a house that "vibrated with young people arguing socialism and anarchism, Hegelian philosophy and Zionism."

It wasn't long before her infatuation with labour Zionism took root and would thereafter guide her destiny. In 1921, after completing her education and with husband Morris in reluctant tow, she moved to British Mandate Palestine.

Life for Golda and Morris was tough and uncompromising, and while she rose to the challenges, he wilted under the pressure. The couple had two children but as aptly expressed by Ha'aretz book reviewer, Shoshana Kordova, Meir, though finding her place in history as "mother of a nation" was "not much of a mother." So consumed was she with her political mission that she had little time for her husband and children. Not surprisingly, her marriage soon fell apart.

But inasmuch as her personal life may have left much to be desired, her imprint on Israel's emergence as a nation is indelible, and her tireless devotion to the state after its establishment knew no bounds. Selfless and principled in whatever she did, she demonstrated a resoluteness of purpose and a strength of character that many of Israel's current leadership could do well to emulate. On the other hand, she was also known to be at times stubborn, vengeful and dictatorial.

Burkett doesn't shy away from exposing all sides of Meir's complex nature. While portraying her as one of Israel's most eloquent, charismatic and influential leaders, she nonetheless pulls no punches in also reflecting on some of Meir's more evident failures, among them her inexperienced handling of the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

All in all, Golda provides a riveting analysis of the events that have shaped modern Israeli history and a singular personality without whom that account would have been so much less compelling.

Sitting on a powder keg

Nine of the outgoing Knesset's 120 MKs belong to Arab parties, and recent polls indicate this number will rise to as many as 12 in the upcoming national election. This bloc will make it hard for the centre-right, led by Likud head Benjamin Netanyahu, to form a coalition. It will make it even more complicated for the centre-left, led by Kadima leader Tzipi Livni, to do so, given the ongoing assumption that non-Zionist parties won't be invited to join a prospective government.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

There are currently 1.45 million Arabs living in Israel, making up almost 20 per cent of its population. Not all are citizens. Most east Jerusalemites and inhabitants of the Golan Heights choose to be non-citizen residents of the country. Most Arabs are Muslim. Ten per cent are Christians. Some 120,000 are Druze. Sixty per cent live in the Galilee, 20 per cent in the "triangle" Sharon settlements, 10 per cent in the Negev and 10 per cent in "mixed" towns and cities.

A semblance of coexistence endures between Jews and Arabs. Separate and not always equal, Arabs, excluding the Druze, are not subject to compulsory military service. This gives young Arabs a two- to three-year head start in starting their adult lives. Yet their employment opportunities are much more limited. Arab university graduates don't easily find jobs in either the public or private sectors. Poverty is prevalent in Arab communities. According to recent data, 51 per cent of Arabs subsist below the poverty line.

Some inroads are being made. An Arab judge sits on the Supreme Court and a Labor Party MK is currently the country's first-ever Muslim government minister. The number of Arab civil servants has grown significantly in the wake of recommendations made by the Or Commission, which investigated the deaths of 13 Israeli Arabs killed by police during riots in October 2000 in support of the start of the second intifadah. But the number of Arab public sector employees is still far from proportional to Arabs' percentage in society, and Arabs hold few senior administrative positions.

Government allocations are being divided more evenly among Arab and Jewish municipalities, correcting past injustices and enabling local development. However, many Arab municipalities continue to falter because of a continuing inability or desire to collect local taxes.

Allegiances are often (rightfully) questioned. Many Arab citizens refer to themselves as "Palestinians in Israel" or "Palestinian citizens of Israel." Poverty and discrimination breed contempt, which in turn breeds nationalism, fundamentalism and hatred. Israeli Arabs have been convicted of spying for Hezbollah, and of helping West Bank suicide bombers reach Israeli cities. Israel's Islamic Movement continues to grow, split into two distinct factions. Its more radical northern branch doesn't recognize Israel's right to exist. The movement often fills the vacuum left by government tightfistedness, independently building sports and health-care facilities.

This convergence of poverty, discrimination, nationalism, and fundamentalism makes for an explosive situation. Periodically, that powder keg bursts, as it did this past Yom Kippur in Acre, one of Israel's mixed communities. On the eve of this sacred day, when all Jewish towns and cities come to a standstill, a reportedly intoxicated Arab resident drove through a Jewish neighbourhood blaring loud music.

His vehicle was stoned, and when false rumours spread through the Arab community that he had been killed, hundreds of Arabs set out on foot from the town's old city on the road to the Jewish area. On the way, they smashed store windows and cars and reportedly shouted "Itbakh el Yahud" (slaughter the Jews) and "Allahu Akbar" (God is great). At the same time, a large group of Jews gathered in their neighborhood.

Police mobilized to prevent confrontations between the two groups, using tear gas to disperse the mob making its way to the Jewish neighborhood, but both Jewish and Arab rioting continued for several days. There was extensive property damage, including the torching of 14 Arab homes. Acre's mayor reluctantly cancelled the Festival of Alternative Theatre, an event of coexistence celebrated yearly during Sukkot. Since then, quiet has been re-instated, although scars remain.

Like many other issues Israeli leaders must deal with, Arab-Jewish relations have no fail-safe solutions. Whoever heads the next government must continue to sensitively dismantle this complex time bomb before it explodes more dangerously than in Acre. This will only be achieved by carrying big sticks, but even larger carrots, butting extremism while promoting economic development and mutual understanding.

Obama and the false prophets of peace

As the Annapolis process reaches its predictable dead end, would-be peacemakers are dusting off their favourite plans to sell to U.S. president-elect Barack Obama. The installation of international peacekeepers in the "occupied territories" in place of Israeli forces, is one of the perennial favourites.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Canadian officials, particularly during the Liberal era of international peace activism and optimism, were active in exploring, and in some cases lobbying, for such an approach to peace. And more recently, Brent Scowcroft and Zbigniew Brzezinski, both of whom served in former U.S. president Jimmy Carter's administration, recently published their "Obama peace plan," which included a Palestinian state and removal of all Israeli settlements and settlers. To ensure security, we are assured, NATO forces would be deployed in the West Bank.

In a simplistic manner, this may make sense, but the reality is far from simple, and the Obama administration would do well to avoid the political equivalent of patent medicine.

In examining operational plans, a number of basic questions arise immediately. With American, Canadian and some European troops engaged in Iraq and Afghanistan, where would the tens of thousands of volunteers for such a force come from? How would they handle conflicts between Hamas and Fatah? How would they stop Palestinians from firing missiles from populated areas into Jerusalem and Tel Aviv? And who would stay after being attacked by terrorists?

The numerous failed efforts over the past 60 years is also not encouraging. In November 2005, after the Israeli unilateral withdrawal from Gaza, the European Union insisted on an operational role and was given control of the Rafah border crossing into Egypt. Shortly afterward, Hamas gunmen entered and the Europeans fled. The agreement – signed with great fanfare and designed to prevent the entry of terrorists – has long been forgotten. As reported sadly on the EU's website. "The Rafah crossing point was last opened with the presence of [EU Border Assistance Mission] Rafah on 9 June 2007. Since then, the mission has remained on standby, ready to re-engage in 24 hours and awaiting a political solution."

What more can be said?

In their eagerness for an immediate solution, advocates such as Scowcroft and Brzezinski also omit the experience in Lebanon. Under the watchful eyes of the United Nations, and in some cases, with the active assistance of uniformed peacekeepers, Hezbollah forces were able to arm, train and deploy forces in preparation for attacks against Israel. And after the 2006 war, UN Security Resolution 1701, which promised a strengthened robust and European-led force, has also failed to prevent Hezbollah from re-arming and returning to southern Lebanon to prepare for another confrontation with Israel.

These less-than-positive experiences have reinforced the lessons of Jewish history and the Israeli Zionist ethos, which has rejected reliance on foreign troops for vital national security.

Despite these facts of life, for the true believers, the international force proposal is still appealing, because of the hidden agenda. The obstacles imposed by reality are irrelevant, as this plan is simply a means to a wider political end – the internationalization of the conflict, which would greatly increase the pressure on Israel to withdraw to the 1949 armistice lines, including in Jerusalem.

In the view of Scowcroft and Brzezinski, which has not changed since the 1970s, Israeli withdrawal and the "end of occupation" is the single essential element for a stable and lasting peace. Palestinian rejectionism is ignored, and the security aspects of the international force are secondary, and in fact need not be realistic at all for the process to go forward.

The bottom line is that there are no shortcuts to peace, and whenever this route is taken, the results are counterproductive, with greater violence and even less of a foundation for mutual compromise.

Instead of listening to the false prophets of peace, Obama and his advisers would do well to approach peace from the bottom up, through societal education, democracy, and tolerance. Without this foundation, all the schemes and grand plans will fail, and Israelis, as well as Palestinians, will have to live with the consequences.

The Kirshner File

Max Brown contributed to Israel's war effort

Hundreds of Canadians volunteered their services to the Zionist cause immediately before and after Israel's birth in 1948, risking life and limb to fight for its survival against the greatest of odds. Max (Maxie) Brown of Toronto was a member of that corps of volunteers, even though he never donned a uniform, manned a barricade or a fortress, drove a tank, fired a gun or threw a grenade.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Among the Canadians who helped Israel turn the tide in the War of Independence, Brown was a most unusual volunteer, a mechanic and pilot who was instrumental in developing a light machine gun for the hard-pressed Israeli armed forces.

Without overstating his contribution, Brown played an integral role in bolstering the fire power of Israel's newly formed army at a time when victory was far from certain. "This gun was very important to Israel's war effort," said Brown, an 86-year-old grandfather.

Brown's expertise was attested to by none other than the late Ben Dunkelman, a Canadian war veteran and volunteer who commanded the 7th Brigade during the War of Independence. In his memoirs, Dual Allegiance, Dunkelman described him as a "military technician" and "expert on small arms" who was so highly valued by the Israelis that he was "whisked away" upon his arrival in Palestine.

Born in Toronto, Brown grew up on Queen Street, the son of a tailor and the grandson of a cobbler. In his late teens, as World War II raged, Brown joined the Royal Canadian Air Force, first as a Class A mechanic and crew chief and later as a pilot who flew bombing missions over Germany's coastal cities.

During his training as a pilot, Brown met a Palestinian Jew named Aron Remis, who would one day become the commander of the Israeli Air Force. Having been impressed by Brown's technical skills, and knowing that he was a Zionist who believed in Jewish statehood, Remis recommended him to Yaakov Dori, the former chief of staff of the Haganah and the first chief of staff of the Israeli army.

When Dori visited Toronto in 1947, less than a year before Israel declared independence, he invited Brown for a meeting at the Royal York Hotel. In short order, Dori asked him whether he would be willing to secretly work on producing a light machine gun for the coming war with the Arabs. At that point, the only machine gun Israel possessed was the Sten, but it was deemed to be insufficient for its needs.

Brown, having won an air force scholarship, was then studying political science and economics at the University of Toronto. But he had no qualms about dropping out of school and dedicating himself to assisting the Yishuv, the Jewish community in Palestine.

Brown worked closely with Carl Ekdahl, a Swede who held the patent for the machine gun that Israel now required. By all accounts, Ekdahl had been approached by both the Israelis and the Egyptians, but he decided in Israel's favour after what happened in the Holocaust.

He and Brown set up shop on the top floor of a Jewish-owned car dealership at the corner of Bay and Wellesley streets, calling the factory the Industrial Research Laboratories.

In his book, The Pledge, Leonard Slater writes about that period, describing Brown as a "dedicated, intelligent and extremely hard-working" person who, with his "nervous gestures, slouched walk, sallow narrow face, and long slick black hair, looked like a young George Raft."

Max Brown and his wife, Anne, in Tel Aviv in 1948

Once the pair had made the tools, dies and jigs needed to manufacture what would be known as the Dror machine gun, as well as the actual prototypes, they shifted operations to the United States for further modifications.

Inside the trunk were two of the six prototype machine guns, each disassembled into three main components – stock, barrel and firing mechanism – and a hundred rounds of .303 British army ammunition, which was was easier to obtain in Canada than in the United States.

At the border, due to an indiscreet remark uttered by the driver, Brown was detained by the Americans. According to Slater, he was held for three days, grilled by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Brown stuck to his story that he had never seen the machine guns and the bullets.

Brown was released on bail, and in the meantime, the RCMP raided the Toronto workshop, shut it down and impounded all its equipment. Thanks to the intervention of Toronto lawyers David Croll and Harold Borins, however, Industrial Research Laboratories was reopened, and Brown was permitted to continue working there.

Shortly afterward, Brown's lawyer in the United States persuaded a judge to deal leniently with him. Instead of the expected 10 years in prison and a hefty fine on charges of arms smuggling, he was let off with a $100 fine and a court order barring him from the United States for a year.

Several days prior to his departure for Palestine – where he would be in charge of the Dror machine gun production line – Brown married his high school sweetheart, Anne Ellenberg, a Rita Hayward look-a-like. They enjoyed a brief honeymoon before Brown had to leave Canada.

Carrying false passports, he and Dunkelman set off for Palestine, reaching Haifa in March 1948. On arrival, Brown met David "Mickey" Marcus, the legendary American colonel who became Israel's first army general.

Apprised of the fact that Brown's suitcase was still in transit, Marcus asked whether he had a change of clothes. "When I said I had only what I was wearing, he quickly gave me one of his U.S. army shirts. I treasured that shirt very much."

Shortly after he reached Haifa, his plucky new bride joined him in Palestine, arriving on the Marine Carp, a converted troop ship.

"It was a big, beautiful surprise for my father," said his daughter, Brona. "On her first night, she was greeted by bullets flying into her hotel from all sides. She ducked under the bed, then calmly went downstairs to inquire about the shooting, and was told that this happened every night."

The gun plant in Tel Aviv of which Brown was in charge employed 130 workers and churned out the Dror and its component parts around the clock. "We worked as quickly as possible to get the guns into the hands of soldiers," he said.

On May 14, 1948, the day Israel declared statehood, Brown and his wife watched a military parade in Tel Aviv and were thrilled to see a line of Dror guns. After the war, the Browns were among the founders of Kibbutz Gesher Aziv, which was mainly populated by Canadian and American immigrants. Following a spell on a moshav, Kfar Daniel, Brown resumed his duties at a weapons factory and was then hired by El Al Airlines as a mechanic.

They lived in Israel for seven years, only returning to Toronto after Anne's father was diagnosed with cancer. "I liked Israel," said Brown. "It was wonderful."

Settling down in Toronto, he opened Brown's TV & Appliances, which morphed into a chain of six stores across Ontario. He and his wife – who died in 2004 and is buried in Jerusalem – worked together as a team.

Still fluent in Hebrew, Brown has neither lost touch with Israel nor sold his house there. For Brown, Israel was a life-changing experience that defined him as a man and a Jew.

UN partition plan wouldn't pass today: analyst

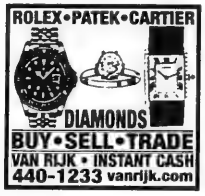
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In a world that's increasingly skeptical of the idea of Jewish statehood, Zionist discourse should be predicated on Israel's meaning and purpose, Israeli writer Daniel Gordis declared earlier this month in Toronto.

Delivering the third Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman lecture of the season at Holy Blossom Temple, Gordis said Israel is not only about freedom, democracy and unfettered possibilities.

In the spirit of the 1917 Balfour Declaration, which called for a Jewish homeland in what was then Palestine, Israel should be regarded as a home for the Jewish people, said Gordis, an author and senior vice-president of the Shalem Center, a right-wing research and educational institute in Jerusalem.

Gordis, an American Jew who made aliyah, began his speech by saying that even a Zionist such as Avraham Burg – the former director of the Jewish Agency – has expressed skepticism about the need for a Jewish state.



Gordis added that the political atmosphere is such that the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan would not pass today.

Zionists should, therefore, be ready to define what Israel means to Jews in the chill of the contemporary world.

Rather than being just another democracy, Israel should be a place where Jews can feel completely at home in terms of their identity, interests and priorities.

Jewish sovereignty in Israel also means hope, said Gordis, whose latest book is titled Coming Together, Coming Apart.

Israel's rebirth, with its message of hope, transformed demoralized Jewish communities in the Diaspora in the wake of the Holocaust, he added.

As well, Jewish statehood restored Jews to the stage of history, and if Israel is destroyed, Jews would lose hope and could not recover from such a devastating blow, he said.

Gordis suggested that Israelis will leave Israel in despair should Iran acquire a nuclear arsenal.

In closing, he urged Jews to say yes to Israel as the world begins to say no to its existence.

Twinning program runs across North America

According to Rabbi Landsberg, Abraham understood that God could never be controlled, so he introduced prayer as a way of engaging in a relationship with God.

She said Abraham brought God into the world through actions or mitzvot. "The connection between the religion of Abraham and Moses is that Abraham observed all the laws that were revealed at Sinai."

Gianotti noted that the Qur'an encompasses writings attributed to both Abraham and Moses. "The Qur'an makes reference to divine commandments."

He said the prophet Muhammad descended from a group of monotheistic desert dwellers believed to have descended from Ishmael. "There was some kind of Abrahamic religion alive in the desert."

Followers "engaged in fasting and gave alms to the poor," he said. "Some Abrahamic tradition is at the core of Islam, Judaism and Christianity."

Gianotti said that in the Qur'an, Ishmael rather than Isaac was the son who was set to be sacrificed by Abraham. "Ishmael was a willing participant."

Rabbi Landsberg pointed to parallels between this interpretation and some talmudic commentary that says Isaac was willing to be sacrificed. "Isaac knew what was going on. He said, 'Bind me tightly father.'"

She also said that some talmudic scholars contend that Qetura, the woman Abraham married after Sarah's death, was actually her former servant Hagar, the mother of Ishmael.

Samira Kanji, president of the Noor centre, was pleased about the outcome of the weekend. "The response from the two communities has been overwhelming. We needed a catalyst like the twinning program."

Gianotti was equally enthusiastic. "This weekend surpassed our expectations. We feel like family. We're like-minded with similar values."

Shahid Akhtar, co-chair of the Canadian Council of Jews and Muslims, called the weekend a "dream come true." He noted that the council, established in 1996, was the first organization in North America to bring Jews and Muslims together.

His Jewish co-chair, Barbara Landau, said the weekend re-energized their group.

"I loved this weekend. It just shows that conflict can be resolved if we appeal to people's best instincts."

Zareinu's miracles celebrated at fashion show

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

At last month's Zareinu Fashion Show, Stacy Markin got emotional when she spoke about her 13-year-old daughter, a Zareinu student, who has recently begun to walk.

Markin told the audience that her daughter, Shayna, now walks independently from the car into school.

This is one of the many miracles that the Zareinu Educational Centre has helped to produce over its 19 years of helping children with special needs reach their maximum potential.

According to doctors who diagnosed her early in life, Shayna should not have been able to walk or talk, or even identify her mother.

She certainly knows who her mother is, waving to her from the runway as she and sister, Kayla, modelled Zero 20 Bambini outfits as part of the fifth annual fashion show, held at the Terrace Banquet Hall in Vaughan.

The show's title, Sunshine + Lollipops, was inspired by Lesley Gore's 1965 song, Sunshine, Lollipops and Rainbows.

The New York-style, high-end fashion show, hosted by Linda Frum, was held on Nov. 20, International Children's Day. The show featured spring 2009 lines from Ports 1961, Hugo Nicholson and Ines di Santo, which were modelled by adult professionals as well as child models, seven of whom are Zareinu students. Some children shared their inspirational stories during the show.

One student who took part is 18 months old. Another participant, a wheelchair user, was hoisted up onto the runway by two strong men.

The children's stories focused on the rainbow of talents children with special needs possess, while shining light on the challenges faced by them on a daily basis. The stories help to combat prejudice and inspire hope.

"Although I haven't been personally touched by challenges that special needs present, I could never look away," said Renee Rosenzweig, who was co-chair of the event, along with Markin. "I recognized the universal nature of this cause.

The Markin sisters, Shayna and Kayla, modelling at the Zareinu Fashion Show.

"The children at Zareinu represent all of us in so many ways. We all struggle with challenges, some more demanding than others."

The Thornhill school, located inside the Sephardic Kehilla Centre, charges annual tuition of $40,000 and accommodates 70 students, only some of the children in the community who need the exceptional services that this one-of-a-kind institution offers.

Guest speaker Sholom Brothman, a Zareinu student since he was six years old, talked of the drastic changes that have come about in his life since entering the school's doors in 1995. Now 19, he is attending the Zareinu boys' high school at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and doing a co-op placement as a teacher's assistant at the Koffler Centre for the Arts. He said that everything in his life is great.

Zareinu provides special education and individualized therapies to children from birth up to 21 years of age, who have a wide range of physical and developmental challenges. Its staff delivers innovative therapeutic treatments and programs to meet their unique needs.

"We think every child is special, and beautiful and important," Markin said. "They should be celebrated and accepted."

Israel Museum gets boost

The Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum (CFIM), in association with Christie's auction house, recently celebrated Israel @ 60 in Toronto and in Montreal with two events.

The evenings showcased gems, jewelry and watches that Christie's plans to auction in December. Funds raised will support free admission to the Israel Museum for Israeli children of all faiths and ethnicities.

Patrons of the arts attended the opulent Toronto evening at Casa Loma on Oct. 28. The evening included an elegant dinner, a lecture on the jewelry and the watches and the opportunity to play dress-up with these precious pieces.

Expect little new spending, newly elected MP says

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

Any new spending by the recently re-elected government of Prime Minister Stephen Harper – and there will be "very little" of it – will focus primarily on infrastructure projects, especially transportation, says the new Tory member of Parliament for Thornhill.

"Tax dollars will be spent very prudently... in areas of infrastructure and stabilizing this country," Peter Kent told a breakfast meeting of the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto congregation's brotherhood.

Given the current global economic crisis, Kent, who defeated Thornhill's incumbent Liberal Susan Kadis by 5,200 votes, said there will be "very little new spending" by Ottawa.

Stressing transportation in the riding itself, he said he has worked with local officials to "encourage and facilitate" the extension of the Yonge subway line "to at least Richmond Hill," and to look at the building of a light rail system along Highway 407.

Peter Kent

In a loosely structured talk, Kent, a former broadcaster who was named to Harper's cabinet as minister of state of foreign affairs (Americas), said he is "convinced that the depths of the international economic crisis that we have barely entered is going to be much more serious than many of us first feared."

However, Canada "is much better positioned than most of the other developed nations to ride this out. But we are going to be bruised, and we are going to have to pull together."

Kent said that Harper asked him "to take on the job of carrying forward a mission in the Americas – our backyard, which has been ignored so often in recent years – to basically engage in economies which until now have basically looked to the northern horizon and seen the United States and the American economy."

Kent touched very little on Israel, whose support by Harper shifted some Jewish votes away from the Liberals, except to say, to applause, that "you can expect more of the same."

He said he had "private thoughts" of visiting Israel, but with the election campaign, "it would be unseemly for a minister to wander in, even on one's own time." And careful not to express any partisan views, he said that he hoped Israeli voters "will make a choice which will provide the sort of leadership to get us through these next few challenging years."

Canada recently signed a free trade deal with Colombia, a move some saw as controversial because of the country's internal violence arising from drug trafficking. But Kent said the deal will "redirect a good part" of Colombia's trade away from the United States to Canada and "will in fact enhance and allow the building of democratic institutions and greater respect for the human rights of all... and in terms of fighting narcotics trafficking."

He said Canada is working on free trade agreements with "other strong emerging democracies" in South America, including Peru, Brazil and the Central American states.

He said he "would be surprised if in the future we ever allowed that search for trade to trump our concern over human rights."

Turning to Iran, Kent related that over the past few years, Canada has sponsored or co-sponsored an annual motion at the United Nations that condemns Iran for its human rights abuses.

In the past, Iran has used "blackmail and other devious techniques" to try to block the vote with a "no action" motion. But this time, Kent said he and foreign minister Lawrence Cannon phoned "some of the wobblers," and the motion to block was defeated by 10 votes versus by just one vote last year.

In the meantime, the resolution condemning Iran passed in a committee and now heads to the UN General Assembly. Kent said it would "treat Iran with the disrespect it deserves."

Kent said he is against any arbitrary or premature disengagement of Canadian troops from Afghanistan. The government has set 2011 as a target date to shift from an active peacemaking role "to one of one reconstruction and peacekeeping." But an early pullout "would put at risk all the gains we have made," which have been "substantial."

Earlier this year, Harper announced that Canada will not attend next year's UN anti-racism conference because the first parley in Durban, South Africa, in 2001 descended into anti-Semitism.

Kent said the Conservatives "will reinforce our belief" that any nation attending what has come to be known as Durban II "is merely helping to provide a podium for hate and is a waste of time, effort and money and is unacceptable diplomatic conduct."

Good things do come in small packages.

Report recommends repeal of anti-hate law

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A widely anticipated report calls for the law prohibiting the electronic dissemination of hate to be scrapped.

University of Windsor law professor Richard Moon recommended that Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act be repealed "so that the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) and the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal no longer deal with hate speech, and in particular hate speech on the Internet."

Moon, who was asked by the CHRC to look into the section last June, recommended that hate speech "should continue to be prohibited under the Criminal Code, but this prohibition should be confined to expression that advocates, justifies or threatens violence.

"The use of censorship by the government should be confined to a narrow category of extreme expression… Less extreme forms of discriminatory expression, although harmful, cannot simply be censored out of public discourse. Any attempt to exclude from public discourse speech that stereotypes or defames the members of an identifiable group would require extraordinary intervention by the state and would dramatically compromise the public commitment to freedom of expression," Moon stated in a 49-page report released last week.

While calling for the end of Section 13, Moon suggested alternatives in the case the section is retained. He called for procedural amendments and narrowing the section's application "to the most extreme instances" in which violence is threatened.

He suggested creating an advisory body that would counsel Internet service providers (ISPs) on whether content violated section 13 and he called for a national press council with compulsory membership that could determine whether a publication breached professional standards and order publication of its findings.

Moon's main recommendation – repeal – found broad support in newspapers across the country. The National Post, the Toronto Star, the Gazette (Montreal) and the Vancouver Sun were among the publications calling for the repeal of section 13.

The Canadian Association of Journalists backed Moon, urging "the federal government to take immediate steps to amend legislation in order to protect this fundamental right [free speech] in our society."

A week before Moon's report was released, the Conservative party voted overwhelmingly at its policy conference to repeal the section.

Jewish groups remained among the section's staunchest defenders, although one, Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC), is in the midst of its own re-evaluation.

FSWC staff were asked by the board in September to prepare a brief examining all sides of the Section 13/free speech argument, said Leo Adler, the organization's director of national affairs.

"Our board wanted to know more. Most of them are not lawyers. For the most part, they had no complete, in-depth knowledge of Section 13, and they asked for a complete in-depth report on it.

"As a result of [Moon's] report and other matters, we are ourselves undergoing a review to see to what extent we should be dealing with Section 13," Adler said. "We've asked people for their opinions in a much broader sense, to come up with a comprehensive program on section 13. We're looking at everything, including his [Moon's] report."

Adler believes the provision remains an important tool in the battle against hate promotion. "The reality is that Section 13 has been used rarely, and only in cases that have clearly been hateful," he said.

Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber said that "we have mixed feelings about the report."

Most of it focused on alternative recommendations ways that the section could be retained while improving its effectiveness. Congress itself has proposed an ISP advisory body and a national press council, he said.

As to the report's main recommendation – repeal – "we feel it is wrongheaded to throw out the baby with the bath water." The Supreme Court of Canada has ruled the section constitutional, Farber said. "It works."

Marvin Kurz, national legal counsel to B'nai Brith Canada said, "Doing away with Section 13… would be a step in the wrong direction. However, we do favour in principle the type of middle approach also outlined by Moon, which opens the door to necessary reform of the CHRC."

"The debate on how to ensure that Canadians are protected against hate, while preserving freedom of expression, demanded fresh thinking," stated CHRC Chief Commissioner Jennifer Lynch.

"The commission is working hard to find the right balance. One thing will remain vital: the CHRC exists to protect Canadians from discrimination. I will fervently uphold this core principle and strive to find more effective means to prevent Canadians from exposure to hate on the Internet," Lynch said.

Moon's review came after two high-profile complaints, one against Maclean's magazine for publishing The Future Belongs to Islam, an excerpt from a book by Mark Steyn, and one against the Western Standard magazine, which re-published infamous Danish editorial cartoons about the Muslim prophet, Muhammad.

United Jewish Appeal Campaign 2009 surpasses $50 million mark

Donors respond to the challenging times

By Daniel Horowitz

United Jewish Appeal Campaign 2009 has reached another impressive milestone, having recently surpassed the $50 million mark.

Chaired by Fran Sonshine and Henry Wolfond, the campaign – a continuation of 2008's Campaign for our Jewish Future – is comprised of four strategic initiatives:

- Inspiring Jewish Identity in the Next Generation
- Standing with the People of Israel
- Transforming Lives
- Engaging a Growing and Dynamic Community

Despite the current global economic climate, United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2009 recently surpassed the $50 million mark.

"What an incredible experience this has been for me and, I'm sure, for Fran," enthuses Wolfond. "To have the opportunity to work with our community, up close and personal, as a campaign chair, has really given me an appreciation of just how compassionate and caring the members of Jewish Toronto really are. To have surpassed the $50 million mark when, since the summer, the economy took a nose dive, speaks volumes about how we take our commitment to tzedakah and tikun olam seriously, regardless of the circumstances."

"Our work is far from done," says Sonshine. "There are many, many people who rely on United Jewish Appeal and its partner agencies now, more than ever, to help them attain the basics, and to live their lives. We have many generous donors who have yet to make a pledge this year. We need them to come through, as they've always done in the past. There's still plenty of time to donate to Campaign 2009, and, if you do so, you will still receive a tax receipt for 2008. It's a win-win situation."

Twelve-year-old Jacob Starr, a first-time UJA donor from Richmond Hill, decided to make his initial foray into the world of tzedakah earlier this month, after watching the news on television with his father, Allan.

"My dad told me that a lot of people were having problems with money, and that some of these families might even lose their houses," explains Jacob. "Lots of these families probably have kids around my age, and I thought that it must be so scary to maybe lose all your money, so I decided that the money I've been saving from my allowance and my paper route would do more good at UJA than in my room. The people who live in Toronto are lucky because we live in a really great city with a great Jewish community, so, I figure if we're that lucky, we should help others. That's what my mom and dad have always taught me and my brother."

Campaign 2009 officially closes on February 10 with a community event at Toronto's Inn on the Park. For more information, or for tickets to the closing celebration, call Michelle Golfman at 416.631.5854 or email her at mgolfman@ujafed.org

Joshua Institute emphasizes collaboration among leaders

By Daniel Horowitz

As Toronto's Jewish community continues to grow, so, too, does the need for a cadre of educated and dynamic community leaders.

Responding to that need, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has launched a comprehensive leadership development program called The Joshua Institute for Jewish Communal Leadership.

The Joshua Institute, which officially launched on November 9 at the Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services, is partnered with the Rotman School of Management, Executive Programs at University of Toronto, to work with Toronto's leading agencies, schools and synagogues.

The current program is aimed specifically at incoming chairs and presidents of community organizations and, beginning in 2009, will focus on new leadership.

"Ours is a community that is in the midst of exciting growth and change," said Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation. "The Joshua Institute will develop a corps of passionate, innovative, caring and visionary leaders who will work collaboratively to strengthen our community and, together, guide it into the future."

"Real collaboration is about giving up something important in the service of the whole," said Marty Linsky, a consultant and author, and the keynote speaker at the Joshua Institute's inaugural session. "Collaboration is particularly challenging in Jewish communal life."

Unique from other North American leadership programs because it brings together participants from different agencies to develop a common vision for the community as a whole, the Joshua Institute's curriculum integrates Jewish values, learning, social responsibility, and an intensive program in Israel. Participants will work with world class faculty and experts who will cover issues such as strategic planning, board governance, financial literacy, effective communication and media training, fundraising and strategic philanthropy.

Participants of The Joshua Institute for Jewish Communal Leadership

"It was so exciting to be at the first session of the Joshua Institute – to be in a room full of so many impressive people in such important positions throughout the community," said Helen Goldlist, the new chair of Jewish Vocational Services (JVS) and a Joshua Institute participant. "I believe that the program is wonderful and is the result of forward thinking on UJA Federation's part. The organization is saying that down the road, we want to make sure that people are ready to assume leadership positions. I'm very flattered to be involved."

"I believe that the Joshua Institute is a unique opportunity for the leadership of agencies within Toronto's Jewish community to learn together, work together and understand community issues together," said Alan Winer, senior vice chair, UJA Federation, and a participant of the Joshua Institute. "Then, when we're all chairs, we will be able to understand each other's perspective and deal with each other with respect through a common language and commonality of interests."

For more information about The Joshua Institute for Jewish Communal Leadership, contact Zeeva Millman at 416.635.2883 ext. 5628 or at zmillman@ujafed.org

New specialty meat supplier offers 'a much better steak'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

His new specialty supply business won't likely fill the immediate void created by beef producer Lazar Yitzchok's recent departure from the local kosher market, but Matis Stebben, founder of Hand Made Foods, is relying on Ontario sources for all his meat.

"Our animals are bought and slaughtered here, so we can control the quality," says Stebben, 33, who started the kosher firm, which is supervised by the Kashruth Council of Canada, in October.

The way an animal tastes, he said, depends on how it is raised and fed, "so by working with local farmers we can be very hands-on."

A native of San Diego, Ca., Stebben came to Toronto to work at Chabad, and then moved on to the Kashruth Council. His new company offers wholesale and retail beef, lamb and veal.

Stebben said that his is the first glatt kosher company – he is also certified by Adas Yisroel – to offer organic, antibiotic and hormone-free meat, "which can be dry-aged for a minimum of 28 days, or to individual specifications.

"Most meat is wet aged. It sits in a bag, and the enzymes break down. Our dry-aged meat is more tender, so we can offer, for instance, a much better steak."

His current product line includes prepackaged steaks, ground beef, roasts, rack of lamb, and shoulder cuts or lamb chops. He is also planning a line of prepared foods such as hamburgers, hot dogs and sausages.

His products are currently available at the Kosher Gourmet at Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue, and through kosher restaurants and caterers.

Also new in Toronto is a hechsher, Badatz Toronto, supervised by Rabbi Amram Assayag.

Moti Bensalmon, spokesperson for Badatz, said it currently supervises a number of local companies, including Pita Pita Bakery, Home Made Quality Foods, Goldstein Bakery and Restaurant, and select products at Krinos Foods. For information, visit www.badatz.ca.

USDS hires new head of school

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

After more than a year without a head of school, United Synagogue Day School has hired an administrator to replace Lucy Cohen, who retired in July 2007.

Claire Somerlus – who was head of school at Winnipeg's Balmoral Hall, a private girls' school that runs from preschool through Grade 12, from 1999 until earlier this year – will take on her new duties at USDS at the beginning of March 2009.

Her immediate priority in the next few months is to get to know her new school – the staff, what students are learning, the ethos and culture, and how things are being done – "to see how we can build on a good school," she said in an interview during a trip to Toronto last week.

As well, she said, she wants to "take a look at USDS being a 21st-century school," which means having students who will become "global citizens" who are inquisitive, innovative, entrepreneurial, responsible, of good character and able to work as part of a team.

Regarding the length of time between heads of school, USDS president Leonard Abramsky told The CJN that, "until we found what we believed was the right fit, we weren't willing to compromise our standards. I think she brings the proper amount of educational and administrative experience, and vision, and... a strong background in Judaism as well."

Following Cohen's departure, the school's top-level administrators and lay leaders met weekly to fill the gap, Abramsky said.

A native of Winnipeg who received her B.Ed. at the University of Manitoba, Somerlus taught briefly at Winnipeg's now-defunct Torah Academy in 1984 and served as principal of a Winnipeg public school with a Hebrew bilingual program from 1998 to 1999.

The mother of two adult children said she wanted to be a teacher from the time she was very young. "I don't think I ever thought of being anything else."

Outside of school hours, Somerlus, a theatre and opera buff, has a long history of community involvements, including a stint as education chair for the sisterhood of Shaarey Zedek Synagogue in Winnipeg and participation on a number of Jewish organizational boards. More recently, she has served as president of the Canadian Association of Independent Schools and as a board member of the Canadian Educational Standards Institute who has chaired school reviews.

After training in youth violence prevention in the early 1990s, it was suggested to her that she train as an administrator. "I've always enjoyed each step of the way," she said.

But her favourite part of the job is contact with students. At Balmoral Hall, Somerlus often had lunch with groups of students who pre-booked the time with her, she said.

"That was an opportunity for me to get to know them on a more personal level."

Somerlus plans to continue the practice at USDS.

She said the notion of being in a Jewish day school appeals to her. "It's a very welcoming community, and I'm excited about that."

USDS is run under the auspices of the Conservative movement and has a total of about 750 students at two campuses in Toronto. A third campus is scheduled to open in September 2009 on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan. The new school will start with junior kindergarten, senior kindergarten and Grade 1 classes.

As an administrator, Somerlus said she likes to work as part of a team and believes strongly in research-based practice.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

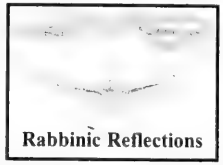
The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Our own personal relationship with God

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER



The Amidah prayer talks about, "God of Abraham, God of Isaac, and God of Jacob." Some streams of Judaism add the four mothers of Israel. Immediately following the citation of the ancestors, we pray to "Ha-Kel hagadol hagibor v'hanorah," the great, mighty, and awesome God, a phrase that's taken from Deuteronomy 10:17. It expresses traditions that arose around our ancestors and their relationship to God.

God promises greatness to the nation that will spring from Abraham if he keeps God's commands. By doing so, Abraham admits that God is greater than he is. Thus, gadol, great, is a word attached to the relationship between Abraham and God.

Much of Isaac's life may lack the lustre of a gibor, a strong man, but he inclines toward strength in his love of Esau, who is called gibor, and in the fact that he stayed together with his father Abraham at the Akedah when most 36-year olds would run from a knife-wielding parent.

Jacob, struck by the power of the ladder dream in this week's Torah portion, cries out, "How awesome is this place. This is nothing less than the house of God." God's awesome inspiration is celebrated in Jacob's words. We identify the concept of an awesome God with Jacob. Three patriarchs – Abraham, Isaac and Jacob – and three words about God – gadol (great), gibor (mighty), and norah (awesome) - and each word can be tied directly to the patriarchs in the order that they are named.

What attributes are attached to the matriarchs? God visits or remembers Sarah as promised, and she bears Isaac in old age. "God visited [pakad in Hebrew] Sarah." So we might say that Sarah's God is Hapoked, the visiting or remembering God.

When Rebecca's twin infants struggle in her womb, she asks God why she must suffer, and God answers her. So perhaps we might speak of God as Haoneh, the One who answers.

When Rachel prays to have a child, God "remembers" her, so God is Hazocher, the One who remembers. Leah was unloved by her husband, who was tricked into marrying her. God saw that she was hated and gave her a child by Jacob. Since God saw the situation, perhaps Leah's relationship is to the God who sees, Haroeh.

Each patriarch had a distinctive relationship with God. That's why the Amidah repeats the word "God" when God of Abraham, God of Isaac, God of Jacob. Each patriarch had a different vision, encounter and life with God.

The mothers of Israel had distinctive connections to God, too. We should be conscious of what the connections were. To the first four women of Israel, God was not great, strong and awesome, but the One who visited, answered, remembered and saw. They had different relationships, perhaps even closer than those of their husbands.

If these seven people, often polar opposites, can all sense a relationship to God, so can we. The Amidah challenges us to derive a term for such a relationship, one that's drawn from our life experience. Do you feel blessed? Then God is Hamevarech, the One who blesses you. Is life a struggle? Then God is the one who challenges you, Hameatger. Do you love insight and learning? Then God is Hameir, the One who enlightens. Have you overcome illness or sorrow? Then God is Harofeh, the healer. Do you mourn? Then God is Hamenachem, the One who comforts, or Habocheh, the One who weeps with you.

Julia Ward Howe, the late-19th-century American social reformer, once invited a U.S. senator to meet the Shakespearean actor Edwin Booth. The senator declined the invitation, remarking loftily, "The truth is, I have got beyond taking an interest in individuals."

Howe commented in her diary on this arrogant remark, "God Almighty has not got so far."

The Amidah calls us to believe and to feel that God takes an interest in individuals in the personal ways that we ourselves need to feel and imagine from our life experiences.

The crises in dating and intermarriage

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

All present studies show that contemporary adults are dating longer, having sexual relationships at a younger age and marrying later than did people of previous generations. Some of this obviously has to do with birth control and the severing of the automatic link between sexuality and pregnancy. Some of it pertains to different personal mores in the wake of the sexual revolution. All of this cannot have failed to have had an impact on Orthodox Judaism.

How does a traditional Jew work this out, especially the problem of sexuality in the face of later marriage? If the answer is to avoid sex and marry young, there is the problem of whether the individuals are emotionally and financially ready for that commitment. But if one counsels young people to "wait a few years until you are ready," how does that reconcile with burgeoning sexual pressure, especially in the wake of the Halachah's severe strictures on pre-marital sexual expression? These are just some of the challenges that face people in their early 20s who wish to maintain a committed Jewish lifestyle.

One hears a lot today about a so-called "shidduch crisis," which is the title of a new book by Dr. Michael Salamon. Though the phrase does have hyperbolic overtones – it would seem to me that starvation in Africa is more of a crisis – it does point to some genuine problems in the present system confronting people who wish to find a partner.

Salomon documents some horror stories about inappropriate questions being asked of singles – everything from what size dress does your mother wear to what kind of tablecloth does your family use. Opportunities for young people to meet in natural ways are also increasingly thwarted in a conservative religious atmosphere, in which separate seating at weddings, for example, leads to difficulties in creating socialization possibilities.

Another particularly vexing issue is that of age. Danielle Jacobs, the chief operating office of a dating website called "SawYouatSinai.com (which claims it has more than 25,000 members), says that "age is a sensitive issue in the Orthodox community, more so than in the secular world. Men are not as open to dating women their own age, never mind a woman who is older. A man is less inclined to date a 30-year-old if he can date a 23-year-old."

It would be a great distortion, of course, to suggest that problems with romance are confined to the Orthodox community. Many Jews don't see it as a priority to marry other Jews. Research has shown that the alienation is especially heavy among men, who, unfortunately, see Jewish women as materialistic and snobbish. To put it bluntly, they are literally running away from Jewish women.

This creates a perfect storm of sorts, since at the same time many non-Jewish women have expressed that they see Jewish men as desirable mates. From Arthur Miller marrying Marilyn Monroe to the fiction of Philip Roth, where the characters fantasize about "shiksas," the lure of the non-Jewish woman has been ever-present in modernity. And the admiration is mutual, apparently.

In the meantime, the loss to the Jewish people and the Jewish family is incalculable. All of this simply scratches the surface of an increasingly problematic situation, and one that warrants serious communal reflection and self-appraisal.

Jewish Life

Escaping 'the sea of chance'

Books
Bernard Baskin

Do we need another biography of Maimonides? One would think not. Books, readily available, cover every aspect of his life, work and personality.

What is different about this formidable volume by Joel L. Kraemer, a scholar of Islamic history and religion, and former professor at the University of Chicago, is that it is based primarily upon documents from the Cairo Genizah, that great repository of manuscripts found in the Ben Ezra Synagogue in Old Cairo and now in European, Russian and American libraries.

The roughly 300,000 manuscripts of the entire Genizah take in a broad range of subjects: the Bible, the Apocrypha, the Talmud, liturgy, philosophy, medicine, and personal and business letters, as well as commercial, legal and communal documents.

What is especially pertinent – where this new biography is concerned – is that this treasure-trove contains many of the private and communal letters of Moses ben Maimon (his full name), some in his own handwriting, along with documents pertaining to his career and public activities. Understandably, these materials are an indispensable source of knowledge of the cultural, economic and social history of Maimonides' era.

Kraemer raises the controversial question, was Maimonides forced to convert to Islam? In his well-known Letter on Forced Conversion, Maimonides included himself among the forced converts who had to seek God's forgiveness. The advice that he gave fellow Jews who had to choose between conversion to Islam or death was to avoid martyrdom. Instead, he suggested dissimilation or migration. It seems that in 1148, the Maimonides family pretended to convert to Islam when the Jews of Cordoba were told to become Muslims or leave, on pain of death.

The author writes that those who deny this act on the part of Maimonides point out that his enemies never mention it. Actually, says Kraemer, we don't really know what his enemies said about him, beyond what has come down to us in documents that are limited in scope. What we need to keep in mind, he suggests, is that Maimonides' conversion to Islam was widely circulated in both Muslim and Jewish sources.

The accomplishments of Maimonides are unparalleled. His compendium of Jewish law, the Mishnah Torah, became the basis for all future Jewish legal codes. His "Guide for the Perplexed," drawing on the teachings of Aristotle and Islamic scholars, argues that reason and faith can be harmoniously interrelated.

Kraemer indicates that Maimonides, brilliant and farsighted in many directions, harboured a variety of contradictions. "He scorned pride and extolled humility, yet he sought power and prestige. He believed that happiness is attained by solitary contemplation, yet he immersed himself in community affairs. Deploring anger, he displayed impatience and petulance in his letters and in public quarrels."

Above all else, Maimonides aspired to revolutionize Judaism by transforming it into a religion of reason. He wanted to change Judaism from a religion rooted in history, in great events such as the Exodus and Revelation, to a religion implanted in nature and the knowledge of the human condition. In a word, God's works rather than God's words.

This monumental biography concludes with these inspiring words, "Maimonides held aloft, amid the chaos and turmoil of his epoch, a love of order, restraint and moderation. His ethical system is a form of therapy, a cure for excessive desires, illusions, false standards and extreme tendencies. If people live by reason and harmony, following ethical and religious precepts, and adhering to a regimen of health, they can escape the 'sea of chance' as far as humanly possible."

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On Dec. 10, Paul Krugman will ascend a dais in Stockholm to be awarded the Nobel Prize in Economic Sciences for deepening "our understanding of the determinants of trade and the location of economic activity." On that day, Krugman will also enter an exclusive – yet surprisingly large – community: Jewish winners of the Nobel Prize.

The Jewish Virtual Library has put together a list of Jewish Nobel Prize Winners since the Nobel Foundation of Sweden first awarded prizes for excellence in physics, medicine, chemistry, economics, literature and world peace. "Between 1901 and 2008, more than 750 Nobel Prizes were handed out. Of these, at least 163 [recipients] are Jews." [tinyurl.com/68ttu]

Winners include: [science.co.il/Prizes.asp]

• Physics: Albert Einstein (1921) "for his services to theoretical physics, and especially for his discovery of the law of the photoelectric effect."

• Literature: Nadine Gordimer (1991) "who through her magnificent epic writing has – in the words of Alfred Nobel – been of very great benefit to humanity."

• Medicine: Karl Landsteiner (1930) "for his discovery of human blood groups."

• Interestingly, Elie Wiesel's 1986 Nobel Prize was not in literature but in the peace category (1986). "Elie Wiesel has emerged as one of the most important spiritual leaders and guides in an age when violence, repression and racism continue to characterize the world." [tinyurl.com/nobelwiesel]

• As for this year's economics winner, Paul Krugman has been a columnist on the op-ed page of the New York Times since 1999. You'll find the articles quite accessible. [tinyurl.com/times krugman]

You can read more about Wiesel, Krugman and all the other winners at the excellent, official Nobel Prize website. [nobelprize.org]

Why have Jews excelled at the award? According to Uzi Arad, director of the Institute of Policy and Strategy at the Interdisciplinary Institute, in Herzliya, Israel, "the reason for the disproportionate number of Jewish winners is the premium Jews have placed on learning and scholarship. The tradition of reflection and scholarship has sharpened the inquisitive Jewish mind. It takes an inquisitive, nonconformist mind to break into new areas and make discoveries." [tinyurl.com/3vrgp]

Writing in Commentary, Charles Murray used the Nobel statistics as a starting point for asking why Jews have excelled disproportionately in the arts and sciences since the 18th century. He examined historical factors such as "occupational selection," the importance of literacy among Jews and heredity – and he set off a firestorm of reaction. [tinyurl.com/commentary1]

One writer took him to task for using the Nobel Prize as a gauge for intelligence. "Consider that women comprise some 50 per cent of the world's population, but fewer than five per cent of Nobel Prize winners. Sweden, with only one-10th of a per cent of the world's population, has contributed approximately five per cent of Nobel laureates. Are Swedes therefore smarter than women?" [tinyurl.com/commentary2]

I did come across some disturbing sites that not only celebrated Jewish achievement at the Nobel Prize but also pointing a wagging finger at others whose numbers were lower.

The Nobel Prizes are always presented on Dec. 10, the birthday of Alfred Nobel. This year, that falls on a Wednesday. But when Prof. Robert Aumann won it in 2005, it fell on a Saturday and that posed some logistical challenges for the Sabbath-observant economist and mathematician. Beyond the kashrut and the hotel room with an electronic lock, another problem arose: Aumann's attire. The banquet has a strict men's dress code: mandatory tails. In order to ensure his suit did not contain shatnez, the biblically forbidden fabric combination of wool and linen, Aumann's tailcoat and trousers were flown to Israel for testing. The article mentions another Israeli Nobel laureate, S.Y. Agnon. The writer was probably the only recipient who included in his acceptance speech the blessing that is said upon seeing the king of a non-Jewish nation. "Blessed is He Who has given of His glory to flesh and blood." [tinyurl.com/aumann]

Mothers, daughters study together in Torah program

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Fela Karmiol, 92, recently celebrated the 10th anniversary of her bat mitzvah by attending a graduation ceremony.

A Holocaust survivor from Lodz, Poland, Karmiol's bat mitzvah was the culmination of a course run by Rachael Turkienicz, educator and founder of Rachael' s Centre for Torah, Mussar and Ethics.

Karmiol attended the graduation of the TOMgirls program, designed by Turkienicz for young women and their mothers (TOM stands for "Torah of our mothers"), "because [even after 10 years], I remember how I felt being near the sefer Torah," she said.

"It was the first time I had learned any Hebrew, and there are no words to describe my joy and interest. I was given a gift."

Galit Kochav-Lev, who participated in TOMgirls with her daughter Tohar, 12, said that four generations of women were present at last month's graduation ceremony, "and that gave tremendous meaning to the event.

"The girls met women who had gone through so much. They learned that these women had a lot to offer, and that they did not have the opportunity to take part in such a course."

This was so much more than other bat mitzvah programs, Kochav-Lev said. "Rather than dropping off my daughter, we learned together."

In addition to weekly themes – such as community building, inner beauty, nourishing ourself and others and tikkun olam – mothers were asked to write their daughters a letter, and the daughters were asked to write a short brachah for their mothers.

"Example of the brachot were 'You should continue smiling' and 'Take a deep breath and remember how good life is,'" said Kochav-Lev.

Turkienicz said the graduation ceremony allowed women of every generation to celebrate learning. "Everyone in the room felt that this is something that needs to be passed on. The relationship with our mothers is something that lasts a lifetime."

She said that she is planning a course for women who want to study with their grown daughters. For information call 416-630-6488 or visit www.rachaelscentre.org.

York centre named after Koschitzkys

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Following a generous gift to York University's Centre for Jewish Studies by the Koschitzky family, York president Mamdouh Shoukri announced that the centre has been renamed the Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies.

At a Nov. 25 reception at the Graydon Hall Manor attended by many Jewish community professionals including the last three directors of the centre, Syd Eisen, Michael Brown and Marty Lockshin, as well as the current director, Sara Horowitz, and of course, members of the Koschitzky family, Golda Koschitzky was honoured for making a donation in honour of York's 50th anniversary and her 100th birthday.

The MC for the evening, Paul Marcus, president and CEO of the York University Foundation, introduced Shoukri who said that although his position as York's president is a tough one, especially given the current strike, it is worthwhile when he is able to celebrate special moments, milestones and new developments.

"This gift is a testament to York's long history of Jewish studies and it will help the centre develop its education as a distinctly modern and interdisciplinary place of study," Shoukri said.

He added that this latest contribution has pushed the York to the Power of 50 Campaign that much closer to its goal of raising $200 million. To date, more than $167 million has been raised.

Marcus said that the gift – the amount of which the donors have chosen not to announce – is being made at a time when the world's economic situation is uncertain.

"We need philanthropic leaders like the Koschitzky family to step forward and help others in need. It is being done at a time when the work at the centre for Jewish studies is more vital than ever before."

The donation will help create an endowment to provide ongoing funding for research and training, dissemination and application of research, organizing conferences and symposia and establishing stronger relationships between Jewish scholars in North America, Europe and Israel.

Horowitz, who is also a Jewish studies professor at York, compared Golda to two matriarchs in the Bible, Sarah and Rebecca.

"Sarah and Rebecca were known for their great hospitality and their graciousness, their generosity that was given with no questions asked and their ability to perceive the needs of others without being told... Like the biblical Sarah and Rebecca, Golda Koschitzky too left a place called home more than one time and like the matriarchs of the Bible, her focus was on building... a home built on spirituality, ethics, learning, compassion and values."

Of course, Horowitz added, behind every successful matriarch, is a man – in this case, the late Israel Koschitzky – and "a strong and wonderful family.

"In the 20 years that the centre has been in existence, the Koschitzky family has repeatedly invited us to dream together and help us to turn those dreams into palpable realities," she said.

This is not the first time the Koschitzkys have made a donation to York. In 1998, they funded the chair in Jewish teacher education that continues to churn out teachers of Hebrew and Jewish studies.

Golda's daughter-in-law, Julia Koschitzky, the centre's past chair on the advisory committee and a York University Foundation board member spoke on behalf of her mother-in-law and her family.

"Over the years, we have seen many new ventures and programs develop in the area of Jewish education, which is consistent with our family's values and belief systems. We see York University as a place where Jewish learning can grow and flourish," said Julia, who also serves on the board of The CJN.

Quoting the chief rabbi of the United Kingdom, Jonathan Sacks, she said that Torah is the anchor that helped the Jewish community survive because Jewish people centred their lives around Jewish study and life was a never ending process of learning.

"So it was for my in-laws, Golda and Israel Koschitzky, who made sure that even during the most difficult times... to find whatever resources they could to hire private teachers, to instruct their two sons, Sol and Henry, to study Jewish texts," she said.

"For Golda and Israel Koschitzky, this was a priority and my mother-in-law still continues to make it one in her ongoing philanthropic endeavours in Toronto, Canada and Israel."

Natives need $4 million to build JNF greenhouse

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Plans to build a greenhouse and training centre on the reserve of the Misipawistik Cree Nation of Grand Rapids in northern Manitoba with the assistance of the Jewish National Fund will only be a "dream" unless $4 million in needed capital funding can be found, its chief says.

Ovide Mercredi, the former national leader of the Assembly of First Nations who leads the approximately 1,400 Cree people of Grand Rapids, spoke to about 50 supporters of the Canadian Technion Society at Winnipeg's Shaarey Zedek Synagogue last month.

Mercredi and a delegation from the Misipawistik Cree Nation of Grand Rapids visited Israel in 2007 as guests of the JNF to learn about greenhouse and water technology. The visit was part of a co-operative partnership agreement between Manitoba and Israel, facilitated by the JNF, to exchange technology in these areas.

Ovide Mercredi

As a result of that exchange, Mercredi, said the Misipawistik Cree Nation has developed a proposal to build a greenhouse using Israeli technology.

The project "will teach our people healthy living and a healthy diet" and also serve as "a commercial venture" to make "hard-needed cash" for the "underemployed people of the reserve," he said.

The proposed JNF-backed greenhouse "is more than just a greenhouse," he added. "It's a training centre where other aboriginal people can be educated about greenhouse technology."

Heidi Cook, project manager for the proposed greenhouse, said that originally, Grand Rapids was chosen as a desirable place to develop the greenhouse project because of a nearby "hydro dam [where the rapids are] and the water never freezes, so we thought we could harness the water as a heat source."

But, she said, "it turns out the water can't be used as a heat source" because although it doesn't freeze, it's too cold.

She added that in order to reduce costs, the province has suggested exploring combining hydro power with a "bio-mass source of heat."

Cook said the sophisticated greenhouse design, championed by JNF scientist Avi Gafni, requires a lot of hydroelectric power, because "the growing process would be mechanized, and the feeding, and lighting is computerized, and it produces a consistently high-quality product."

Mercredi said the province doesn't want the band to use the more expensive Israeli design, but he said it's better because it would be a training centre in addition to a greenhouse, and because it's technically superior.

Cook said that according to a feasibility study that's now being prepared, the greenhouse would employ about eight people, as well as 20 additional workers during harvest time. As well, the training centre could train 10 other people at a time.

Cook said that the feasibility study "will assess available markets in the north," where vegetables "are more expensive and not very fresh."

Mercredi said that if "[Manitoba] Hydro had a conscience, they would give us free electricity."

According to Mercredi, historically, the Cree people in the area grew their own food by gardening, but in 1959, Manitoba Hydro built a dam at Grand Rapids, as if the people who lived there had "no existing rights."

He said building the dam required the demolition of homes owned by non-status Indians, and it took up much of the best local growing land.

Manitoba Hydro spokesperson Glenn Schneider said that Mercredi "has never raised this issue about [non-status] Métis homes in Grand Rapids being demolished by Manitoba Hydro in the 1960s without compensation."

He added that "Manitoba Hydro has entered into a number of settlement agreements with respect to the impacts associated with the development of the Grand Rapids Generating Station" and that it's "providing technical advice and expertise related to the potential development by Misipawistik Cree Nation of the greenhouse that Chief Mercredi mentioned."

Mercredi said that so far, only Ottawa has committed funds to project, but he will try to persuade the province to earmark funds to it as well.

"We are going to try to squeeze the current government until they give it," he said.

He also noted that under the Indian Act, there must be a referendum to get "consent of our people to designate the [reserve] and [the greenhouse] for commercial use."

He said he wanted the greenhouse training centre to serve as "the Technion of the North."

Arrests made in connection with Ste. Agathe incidents

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Four suspects, three of them minors, are expected to face charges related to incidents in the Ste. Agathe, Que., area this summer that appear to have been motivated by anti-Semitism.

The Sûreté du Québec arrested a minor for the assault of Mendy Haouzi, a 23-year-old McGill University student who alleged that he was struck in the face by a youth while he and his father and two younger half-brothers visiting from France were walking on a main street in the Laurentian resort town in August.

The three others were apprehended for vandalism in connection with the spray-painting earlier in the summer of cars owned by chassidic Jews who spend summers in the area.

Rabbi Emanuel Carlebach, spiritual leader of Ste. Agathe's House of Israel Congregation, said he hopes "something positive will come out of this.

"You have to ask what these young people are learning in the home. Why is there so much hate against Jews? I don't understand it. There has to be more education of the parents and the kids."

Rabbi Carlebach, who has led the congregation for 23 years, said this past summer was the worst he has known for vandalism and property crimes, as well as verbal harassment, directed at visibly observant Jews.

The violence against Haouzi in broad daylight was viewed as the most serious in a string of suspicious events.

On Saturday, Aug. 16, Haouzi was walking to Shabbat services at the House of Israel with his father and half-brothers aged 11 and 9, all wearing kippot.

He has told the media a group of youths began throwing coins at them and making derogatory remarks.

When he asked them why they were doing that, one of them punched him hard enough to cause a bloody nose and black eye.

UTT firebomber's mother gets probation sentence

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish groups are not pleased with the 12-month probation sentence given to the mother of the young man who was convicted of firebombing a Jewish school in 2004, but B'nai Brith Canada is taking a much less sympathetic position than Canadian Jewish Congress.

In September, Rouba Elmerhebi Fahd was found guilty of being an accessory after the fact in her son's crime, because she tried to help him flee the country.

On Nov. 25, Quebec Court judge Robert Marchi handed down a sentence that steered a middle ground between the Crown's request that Elmerhebi Fahd be obliged to perform community service and her lawyer's argument for an unconditional discharge, which would have left her with no criminal record. She faced a maximum punishment of seven years imprisonment.

"Without condoning in any way the acts committed by the accused, one can understand… a mother acting in this way for her child," Marchi said from the bench.

CJC vice-president Adam Atlas described the sentence as "very mild," but said the organization is satisfied that justice has been rendered, given that a mother's natural instinct is to help her child.

Sleiman Elmerhebi, who was 19 at the time, eventually pleaded guilty and served a 40-month jail term.

The judge also took into account that Elmerhebi Fahd, 40, a Lebanese immigrant, did not conspire in her son's crime, has had no previous brushes with the law and has three daughters younger than Sleiman.

He balanced that against the fact that she never showed remorse and that she "took positive action to assist her son in evading justice."

B'nai Brith said her punishment does not befit the seriousness of this violent and hate-motivated crime, aimed at terrorizing Jews.

"The sentence is an insufficient deterrent and effectively enables the mother to avoid facing the consequences of her actions," said Moise Moghrabi, regional chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The honorees at this year's Jewish National Fund's Negev Dinner are well-known locally for their philanthropy.

Barbara Crook and Dan Greenberg have supported causes anonymously for many years. The couple have decided to cast aside their anonymity in order to take a leadership role and to encourage others to follow.

Their recent major philanthropic donations have gone to the University of Ottawa, the Queensway-Carleton Hospital and the Great Canadian Theatre Company.

Greenberg is the son of the late Irving Greenberg, a co-founder of Minto Developments Inc., a major local development company that is still run by members of the Greenberg family. No longer involved in Minto, Dan Greenberg is now the president of Otnim Properties Limited.

The Greenberg family has made, and continues to make, contributions to the community.

Associate director and North American representative of Palestinian Media Watch, Crook is a former newspaper editor and writer who has taught at Carleton University. She is also a theatre producer. Very proud to be known as a "Jew by choice," she first visited Israel on a mission in 2003 and fell in love with the country immediately.

Dennis Ross, a foreign policy adviser for U.S. president-elect Barack Obama, was the keynote speaker for the dinner, held at the Canadian Museum of Civilization on Nov 24. A career foreign service officer, Ross was the lead negotiator on Israeli-Palestinian issues for U.S. presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton.

"I don't want to talk about what President Obama will do, but what he is going to face," Ross said.

Regarding the Israeli-Palestinian situation, Ross said that the problem is one of disbelief: both sides have lost belief that peace can be achieved. "You have to deal with the issue of disbelief… you have to operate on multiple levels," he said.

With the funds raised from the Negev Dinner, Crook and Greenberg will support a reservoir project in the Upper Galilee, which will purify and recycle water for agricultural use. The Crook/Greenberg Mishmar HaYarden Reservoir is located north of Lake Kinneret, near Safed.

Ahenakew still blames Jews for WWII

Compiled by CJN Staff

Former national aboriginal leader David Ahenakew says he doesn't hate Jews, he just hates "what they do," and he still blames them for starting World War II.

He made the remarks in testimony last week in Saskatoon, where he is standing trial a second time for hate crime based on anti-Semitic slurs he uttered to a reporter five years ago.

The trial, which began Nov. 24, has him facing charges again for comments he made to a reporter from the Saskatoon StarPhoenix in December 2002, when he called Jews "a disease" and said they were the cause of World War II.

He added that Hitler "fried six million of those guys" because "Jews would have owned the God-damned world" had the Nazi leader not taken action.

In 2005, Ahenakew was convicted of the rare crime of wilfully promoting hatred against an identifiable group and fined $1,000. He was also stripped of his Order of Canada. He later apologized.

The conviction was overturned on appeal in a ruling that was appealed by the Crown.

Earlier this year, the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal, ruling that while Ahenakew's remarks about Jews were "shocking, brutal and hurtful," they were not illegal.

The Crown decided to pursue a retrial.

Wendy Lampert, director of community relations with Canadian Jewish Congress, attended the retrial on Nov. 26, and told The CJN that Congress hopes the case will be resolved quickly. — With files from JTA

Rabbis to take up Schalit's case this Shabbat

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — At least 65 rabbis across the country will use the power of the pulpit this Shabbat – Dec. 6 – to launch a campaign calling on the Canadian government and parliamentarians to step up efforts on behalf of Gilad Schalit, the Israeli soldier who was taken captive by Hamas in a cross-border raid on June 25, 2006.

Schalit, now 22, is believed to be alive and in captivity in Gaza.

Rabbis from Halifax to Vancouver have agreed to exhort congregants on Dec. 6 to write letters to their MPs and relevant parliamentarians, such as the foreign affairs minister or those in opposition, urging them to bring up Schalit's case in Parliament and at international forums such as the United Nations.

Gilad Schalit

"This is an initiative starting with rabbis and synagogues," Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Montreal's Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem synagogue told The CJN, "but we're planning to spread it to campuses, federations, and eventually as a lobbying mission to Parliament Hill.

The mobilization effort started in mid-November with letters to Canadian rabbis co-signed by rabbis Steinmetz and Reuben Poupko, spiritual leader of Montreal's Beth Israel Beh Aaron Congregation.

They co-chair the Canadian Rabbinic Caucus (CRC), described by Rabbi Steinmetz as the "rabbinic arm" of the Canada-Israel Committee. Another "major partner," Rabbi Steinmetz said, has been the Canadian Jewish Public Affairs Committee (CJPAC), which advocates for Israel on behalf of its membership, and whose state-of-the-art computer software is being utilized for the lobbying campaign.

"What we really want is for the Canadian parliament and government to speak out at the United Nations, the Red Cross, even to the Egyptian government, to take up Gilad Schalit's case.

"At the very least [we'd like to see a] visit [to Schalit] by the Red Cross," Rabbi Steinmetz said. "This is the beginning of a co-ordinated campaign."

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, who will address the issue from the pulpit as part of the initiative, told The CJN he believes rabbis, as communal leaders, "need to speak to our people to rally their consciousness and engage in what's crucial to our people.

"We pray for [Schalit] all the time, that he should return safely," he said, adding that not just prayer, but "constructive action" is warranted.

Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto said that his goal in participating in the project is "to make people think about the freedoms we enjoy here… and that we have an obligation to our people, wherever they may be, to rescue them from captivity."

"There is a real feeling that we as a Jewish community have not paid enough attention to Gilad Schalit," said Rabbi Steinmetz.

"I think there has been a little bit of a laissez-faire attitude. But I think this [campaign] can have a serious impact. This is a critical cause and we take it very seriously. Canada can make a big difference in Gilad Schalit's life."

Rabbi Steinmetz said he had been mulling over the idea to do more for Schalit since Rosh Hashanah, and he believes the initiative represents perhaps the first time rabbis anywhere have been galvanized in this way for his cause. The CRC is also supplying participating rabbis with backgrounders for their sermons and flyers to distribute to congregants.

"It is a large complement of the Canadian pulpit rabbinate," he said.

Rabbi Steinmetz also remains convinced that pressure by Canada and other international actors on Hamas could "make a difference," despite the terror group probably being "somewhat averse to listening to the international community.

"Pressure can work everywhere, even with Hamas."

Rabbi Steinmetz said he finds it "somewhat sad" that the Schalit case has not been taken up more by the grassroots of Jewish communities around the world, perhaps out of sentiments of "leaving it to Israel" or that if things "are quiet, why push?"

He could not disagree more.

"I have to emphasize, this is just the beginning," he said. "It's critical we start here. You've got to start somewhere, and this is where we start."

Rabbi Poupko agreed, calling it important for Canadian Jews and parliamentarians to "be engaged" in the case and that Schalit should not be forgotten.

"They have to remember that there is a young Jewish man still being held hostage."

For Obama, Syria might be easier than the Palestinians

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Acknowledging that peace with Syria would significantly change the regional strategic balance and shore up existing peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan, successive Israeli leaders have engaged in long and detailed negotiations with Damascus.

In the early 1990s, former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin came close to reaching an agreement with Syria. Subsequent Israeli prime ministers Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak also tried to achieve a breakthrough.

Most recently, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert arranged four rounds of indirect talks with Syria through Turkish mediators, and indicated an interest in a fifth round.

Reports of these negotiations typically focus on the concessions required by each side. Israel would have to give up the strategic Golan Heights. Syria would have to recognize Israel and provide security guarantees, including a demilitarized Golan. It would also have to sever ties with terrorist groups, including Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad and Hamas, along with the principal state supporting them, Iran. Syria has never indicated that it's prepared to meet the last condition, although there have been reports that, behind the scenes, "moderates" within the regime would accept it.

So the debate goes on.

In "Start With Syria"(Washington Post, Nov. 26), Aaron David Miller, a former Middle East adviser to both Democratic and Republican secretaries of state, argues that the new United States administration under president-elect Barack Obama stands a better chance of achieving success on the Israeli-Syrian track than in pursuing an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement, where circumstances make progress in the near future almost impossible.

Regarding the Palestinians, Miller writes that "dysfunction and confusion reign. The Palestinian national movement is riven with geographic and political divisions between Hamas (itself divided) and Fatah (even more divided). There is little chance of creating a united Palestinian house that can take control of the guns and offer up a viable and unified negotiating position that any Israeli government could accept."

He adds that "Weak leadership and unstable coalition politics prevail in Israel, too."

Miller claims that "[f]or a president looking for a way to buck up America's credibility, an Israeli-Syrian agreement offers a potential bonus. Such a deal would begin to realign the region's architecture in a way that serves broader U.S. interests."

At least on this track, Miller writes, "there are two states at the table, rather than one state and a dysfunctional national movement. A quiet border, courtesy of Henry Kissinger's 1974 disengagement diplomacy, prevails. And there are fewer settlers on the Golan Heights and no mega-ton issues such as the status of Jerusalem to blow up the talks. Indeed, the issues are straightforward – withdrawal, peace, security and water – and the gaps are clear and ready to be bridged."

Nonetheless, Miller offers an important caution regarding Syria's association with Iran: "Syria won't walk away from a 30-year relationship with Iran; weaning the Syrians from Iran would have to occur gradually, requiring a major international effort to marshal economic and political support for Damascus."

"Still," he continues, "an Israeli-Syrian peace treaty would confront Hamas, Hezbollah and Iran with tough choices and reduced options."

Syria's long-term intentions regarding Iran and Hezbollah remain a key unknown. That's true even for those who take the more optimistic view that, over time, with the proper U.S. and western inducements, Syria can be wooed away from rejectionists.

Bashar Assad

On Nov. 24, Associated Press reported that Syrian President Bashar Assad, during a meeting in Damascus, awarded Samir Kuntar Syria's highest medal, the "Order of Merit," for spending nearly three decades in an Israeli jail.

Kuntar had been convicted of one of the most heinous attacks in Israeli history – brutally murdering a four-year-old girl and her father in 1979. He was released as part of a highly controversial prisoner exchange between Israel and Hezbollah this past summer, and was given a hero's reception upon his return to Lebanon.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. My son is 15 months old and has become a poor and picky eater lately. I am concerned that he seems to have only a small repertoire of foods he will eat and is not interested in eating in general. Please help.

A. This behaviour is not uncommon at this age. However, the first thing you want to ask yourself is whether your child is losing weight or falling off his growth chart. Your son's doctor can tell you this. If this is not the case, then you probably don't need to be overly concerned, for several reasons.

First, kids at this age require fewer calories than they did in their first year of life. Consider the tremendous growth that occurs from birth to a year, compared to the period from one to two years of age. A decrease in appetite and food intake is quite normal.

This also coincides with a time when babies start to move, crawl, walk and explore. The world is far too exciting for them to want to spend a lot of time sitting at the table.

The fact that your child likes a small number of foods is also common. Kids at this age love repetition – the same book, same video, song, toy, caregiver, routine, etc.

Here are a few things to consider: make a list of the foods your child does reliably eat, and highlight which are healthy foods. As long as there are some healthy choices on that list, then don't fret about offering these foods over and over again. If the child doesn't mind, don't let it stress you out either. Also, consider how much, and what, your baby is drinking. Many kids at this stage are over-consuming liquid calories and then are not hungry for food.

At this age, only 16 ounces of milk per day are required to meet calcium requirements, and most babies are on whole milk for fat, which is fine. But remember that it's filling, so try not to offer milk before a meal, but rather afterward or at bedtime, so that it doesn't affect appetite.

You also want to evaluate if your child is grazing all day. If he is eating small amounts of food throughout the day, he may not have a chance to actually ever get hungry. So try to have planned meals and snacks with space in between.

Q. I have read about how healthy nuts are, but I wonder which ones are best and how much to eat?

A. Nuts are a nutrition powerhouse, particularly almonds and walnuts. They are very heart healthy and a good source of fibre and protein They also happen to be a portable, nonperishable snack, making them easy to pack in a purse, desk, briefcase or car.

This is a case, however, where more isn't necessarily better. Nuts are high in fat, and even though it is heart-healthy fat, this makes them high in calories – about 15 to 20 almonds or walnut halves per day is the recommended amount.

Nuts make a filling snack and are packed with protein for energy. They are great plain or in cereal, yogurt, salads and baked goods. If you are not already making nuts a part of your daily diet, I suggest you start.

Q. I am a woman trying to lose weight and wondering how much fat I can eat in a day, and how much oil.

A. Typically for a woman to lose weight, she should consume about 40 grams of fat per day at the most.

I am glad you also asked about oil, because this is a place that a lot of hidden fat comes from. One tablespoon of oil, any oil, contains 14 grams of fat, and that's a lot. Some oils are good fat, heart healthy – omega 3 and 6, for instance – but they are still 100 per cent fat and contain that 14 grams. It's really easy to add 1 or 2 or more tablespoons to a salad or a sautee pan to make an egg, or to vegetables. So you should avoid being heavy handed with the oil.

" הממשלה הפדראלית שלחה לכל אזרח אמריקאי שש מאות דולאר החזר מס. אם נוציא את הכסף בוול מארט-הכסף יילך לסין. אם נוציא את הכסף על דלק-הכסף יילך לערבים. אם נוציא אותו על פירות וירקות-הכסף יילך למקסיקו, הנדראס וגואטמלה. אם נקנה מכונית טובה-הכסף יילך לגרמניה. הדרך היחידה לשמור את הכסף באר"ב הוא להוציא אותו על בידה או וותת, כי אלה שני הדברים היחידים שעדיין מיוצרים באמריקה. אני תורם את חלקי בשני תחומים אלה"....

הישראלים

משוגעים על המדינה אבל שונאים ישראלים.

מפיקים חתונות גראנדיוזיות ומתגרשים אחרי המשבר הראשון.

Pope praises Nazi-era pontiff

Jews says Pius XII turned blind eye to Holocaust

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Pope Benedict paid tribute on Sunday to Nazi-era pontiff Pius XII, who is at the centre of a controversy with Jewish groups accusing him of turning a blind eye to the Holocaust.

The Pope was giving mass at Rome's San Lorenzo basilica, which was partly destroyed by massive Allied bombing on July 19, 1943, that killed at least 3,000 people across the neighbourhood. He said Pius had rushed to the scene to assist the victims.

Pope Benedict

"The generous gesture on that occasion by my venerable predecessor, who immediately ran to help and comfort the stricken population in the smouldering rubble, cannot be erased from historical memories," the Pope said in his homily.

The Nazi-era pontiff, who ruled from 1939 until his death in 1958, has been accused by some Jews of inaction over the Holocaust during World War II, a charge his supporters and the Vatican deny.

Several influential Jewish groups have called on Benedict to freeze the process that could one day make Pius a saint until more Vatican archives on the wartime period are opened, with one Italian Jewish leader saying that making Pius a saint before information is available would open a "wound difficult to heal."

At issue is whether Benedict should let Pius proceed on the road to sainthood which Catholic supporters want – by signing a decree recognizing his "heroic virtues." This would clear the way for beatification, the last step before sainthood.

Benedict has so far not signed the decree – approved last year by the Vatican's department in charge of saints, opting instead for what the Vatican has called a period of reflection.

Pope Pius XII

The Vatican says while Pius did not speak out against the Holocaust, he worked behind the scenes to help Jews because direct intervention would have worsened the situation by prompting retaliation by Hitler.

RABBINIC SEARCH: TWO POSITIONS

Toronto, Ontario Canada

Beth Tzedec is a landmark Conservative congregation of 2,700 households, offering an innovative range of religious, educational, cultural, and charitable services to congregants and the broader Jewish community in Canada's largest city. Our membership reflects all age and socio-economic layers of Toronto Jewry—a vibrant, involved and well-resourced community.

Beth Tzedec's Klei Kodesh, professional staff and lay leadership share commitments to tradition and continuity; we work in partnership to provide programs and services to help people along personal paths through Torah, Avodah and Gemilut Hasadim.

We seek two Rabbis to join us, as teachers of Torah, exemplars of hesed umishpat, and guides to tefillah:

1. Experienced Rabbi (8-10 years)
You will work with our active Senior Rabbi, alongside our rabbinic, cantorial and educational staff. In addition to providing pastoral support to our members, you will coordinate our calendar of adult lifelong learning, advise our alternate Shabbat minyan, and resource our Family Institute to engage and enrich young families.

2. Recently Ordained Rabbi (3-5 years)
Under the guidance of our Senior Rabbi, you will collaborate with our rabbinic, cantorial and educational staff. You will provide pastoral support to our members, engage young adults (singles and couples), energize our social action agenda, instruct potential converts, and maintain an active presence in our congregational school.

Positions are full time, with competitive remuneration, health, and pension benefits. Available August, 2009.

Terror in Mumbai

Mexican among those slain at Chabad House

"At no stage were the issues of whether or not Israel should join the operation, or do things that were within the power of the Indian government and its strong and trained military to do alone, on the agenda," Olmert told the cabinet at its weekly meeting. "I am very pleased at the co-operation and would like to take this opportunity to thank the Indian government for seeing fit to update us throughout the events."

Among those killed in the Chabad house were its director, Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg, and his wife, Rivkah. Rabbi Holtzberg was a dual U.S.-Israeli citizen; Rivkah was Israeli. A cook from the Nariman House had fled to safety earlier with the Holtzbergs' two-year-old son, Moshe.

Also slain was Norma Shvarzblat Rabinovich, 50, who was scheduled to make aliyah. Rabinovich, a Mexican citizen, had plans to leave for Israel on Monday this week to join two of her three children already living there.

Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg and his wife Rivkah

The Jewish Agency announced Nov. 29 that it would financially assist the Jewish and Israeli families of those killed in last week's Mumbai attack from the Fund for the Victims of Terror. The eight-year-old fund has assisted thousands of victims of terror attacks and their families. Money for the fund comes from the United Jewish Communities, Jewish federations and Keren Hayesod.

Israel has sent a forensics team, including experts on the identification of human remains, to Mumbai, Israeli media reported. The team will bring the bodies of the Israeli dead back to the country.

In addition, Israel has sent a group of anti-terrorism experts to Mumbai to study how the large-scale attack was carried out and who was behind it.

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who at a Nov. 28 news conference in Jerusalem confirmed the five Israelis' deaths, said extremist Islamist hatred does not stop at Israel's shores.

"In India or elsewhere, there are extremist Islamic forces who don't accept our existence or the western way of life," Livni said. "It's a shame that this kind of event must remind part of the western world about this reality. The target is not just Israel but the West."

The Chabad centre, at 5 Hormusji St., is a popular destination for young Israeli backpackers, who often make the trip after their compulsory army service. The Holtzbergs moved to Mumbai in 2003 from Brooklyn, N.Y., to do Jewish outreach work in India.

Israel Radio quoted Indian security officials as saying that the Israelis were evidently killed at the outset of the attacks and not during the commando raids to free them some two days later.

Gunmen armed with automatic rifles and grenades struck 10 locations in Mumbai on the night of Nov. 26 in co-ordinated attacks at sites frequented by Westerners, including hotels, restaurants and a railway station. The terrorists also took hostages at the Taj Mahal and Trident-Oberoi luxury hotels.

A little-known organization calling itself the Deccan Mujahideen claimed responsibility for the attacks. The group had taken responsibility for only a single prior attack. Its grievances were local, but its terrorist tactics are part of a global pattern that includes the most virulent strand of Israel hatred.

The evidence suggested that Jews were targeted deliberately, Livni said. Since the Chabad House is tucked away at the end of an alley, it is unlikely that the raid there was happenstance.

"We have no doubt that the targets of the terrorists were Jewish and Israeli, as well as American and British," Livni said.

Israel and India have shared common security interests in recent years, and India has become a leading buyer of Israeli arms and weapons technologies.

It's a natural fit between the world's most populous democracy and one of its smallest, said Jason Isaacson, the American Jewish Committee's (AJC) director of international affairs.

"There's been close co-operation and consultation between India and Israel on counterterrorism and security," Isaacson told JTA on Nov. 28, after spending 36 hours in nearly non-stop consultations with AJC's representative in India, Priya Tandon, as well as with senior Indian, Israel and U.S. government officials. "This is a further reminder that all democracies face the threat of Islamic extremism."

India, a vast multicultural society, has welcomed Jews for centuries, perhaps as far back as the destruction of the Second Temple. Many believe that India's first Jews were shipwrecked refugees from the Roman expulsion in 70 CE.

"There is no fertile ground for anti-Semitism" in India, Isaacson said. "It's a multiethnic society where Jews have always been comfortable and welcomed."

Israeli-Indian relations were cool during the Cold War, when India's then-ruling Congress party assiduously pursued non-aligned status. In the wake of the collapse of the Soviet Union at the end of the 1980s, India expanded ties with Israel, upgrading its Tel Aviv consulate to an embassy and developing strong relations with the Jewish state.

A key element in the relationship has been close ties with U.S. Jewish organizations, particularly in the pursuit of a closer relationship with the U.S. defence establishment.

One component of that relationship was the establishment of the Chabad centre in Mumbai. In a sign of U.S. sensitivity about the relationship, Rabbi Levi Shemtov, the director of American Friends of Lubavitch and Chabad's Washington representative, said he received calls of concern this week from Josh Bolten, the White House chief of staff, and Joe Biden, the vice-president-elect.

Charges against Olmert?

Israel's attorney general is mulling charges against Ehud Olmert for using public funds to pay for family vacations. Menachem Mazuz told the prime minister's lawyer Nov. 23 that he's considering several counts in what's known as the Rishon Tours double-billing scandal. Olmert is under investigation in six unrelated cases, including the Talansky Affair, in which he's said to have received illegal contributions from a U.S. businessman over 15 years. The probes led him to resign, effective after elections in February.

Youths riot

About 50 Jewish youths rioted in Hebron, damaging dozens of Palestinian cars. They also threw stones at Palestinian homes on the night of Nov. 29. The day before, Jews and Palestinians threw stones at each other outside the disputed "Peace House," the four-storey building between Kiryat Arba and the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron. The violence of the past few weeks came after the High Court of Justice upheld a government order that Jewish families living in the building vacate until ownership is determined. The families remain. Four boys, ages 14 to 16, were arrested Nov. 28 for cutting the fence around Kiryat Arba. A girl, 17, was arrested held for throwing stones at an Arab area. The teens don't live in Hebron.

Iran seeks death for 'spies'

Iran's chief prosecutor said he'll seek the death penalty for three Iranians accused of spying for Israel, whom he said trained in the Jewish state, Iranian media reported Nov. 25. Israel didn't comment. Iran executed an Iranian businessman last month convicted of spying for Israel.

Last two missing Israelis found alive and well

MUMBAI — The Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem announced Monday that the final two Israelis who had been unaccounted for in Mumbai since Islamist terrorists attacked the city last week have been located alive and healthy.

Seven members members of the police's victim identification unit had flown to India on Sunday to assist in locating the two missing Israelis, who were feared killed in one of the terror attacks that struck the city.

Meanwhile, dozens gathered at the Knesset Eliyahu Synagogue in Mumbai for an emotional ceremony in memory of the six Jews killed last week when Islamist terrorists attacked the city's Chabad headquarters.

Rabbi Shmuel Rosenberg, whose daughter, Rivka, and son-in-law, Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg, both died in the attack, called on the mourners to continue the work his children had begun as the Lubavitch movement's emissaries to Mumbai and vowed that Chabad would continue to operate in the city despite the bloody acts.

Among the participants at the ceremony were Israel's ambassador to India and members of the Israeli rescue team, but all eyes in the room were on the Holtzbergs' two-year-old son, Moshe, who brought the room to tears when during the ceremony he cried out: "Mommy, mommy!"

Mark Sofer, the Israeli ambassador to India, also paid tribute to the victims.

"This is a tragedy for India and a tragedy for Israel, but above all for the families," he said. "We, our Indian friends and the rest of the civilized world will continue to fight terrorism, until we win."

The bodies of the Mumbai victims were flown back to Israel on Monday for burial.

Victim's family rejects official memorial

By YAIR ETTINGER

JERUSALEM — The family of Aryeh Leibish Teitelboim, one of six people killed when the Chabad House in Mumbai was attacked by Islamist militants last week, has rejected Israel's offer to hold an official memorial ceremony for him along with the other Jewish and Israeli fatalities.

The family has also said that it does not want Teitelboim's coffin wrapped in an Israeli flag before it was to be boarded onto the plane in India Monday, as those of the other Jewish and Israeli victims will be.

Teitelboim's relatives and members of his Toldot Avraham Yitzhak community also asked that his coffin not be included in the official ceremony to be held upon landing at Ben-Gurion International Airport.

Teitelboim grew up a member of the Hasidic Satmar sect and married into the Toldot Avraham Yitzhak sect, two communities that oppose Zionism and don't recognize the State of Israel.

Teitelboim, who holds a U.S. passport, as do many Satmar followers in Israel, disavowed his Israeli citizenship, despite residing in Jerusalem. His wife and eight children hold Israeli citizenship.

"The murder victim was educated in the ways of Satmar, which opposes the State of Israel," one of Teitelboim's relatives told Ha'aretz. "How can he turn into a symbol of the State of Israel? The family is very concerned about what will happen here at the ceremony. They are angry about the whole matter. It is a very sensitive issue."

Teitelboim's funeral was be held in Jerusalem and was expected to be attended by hundreds of Chassidim. The esteemed Toldot Avraham Yitzhak rabbi cut short his visit to the United States in order to attend.

Where is Gilad?

At 5:40 AM on Sunday, June 26, 2006, a group of Hamas terrorists crossed over the border from Gaza into Israel and abducted Gilad Shalit. He has been a prisoner in Gaza ever since, during which time Hamas has denied the Red Cross and other international organizations access. More than two years in captivity is too much. It's time to bring Gilad home.

On Saturday December 6th, Rabbis across Canada will be speaking about Gilad's plight and encouraging the Jewish community to take action. Please join the Canadian Rabbinical Caucus as it calls for Canada to speak up for Gilad on the world stage. For information on how you can get involved and send a

By SHLOMIT KRIGER
Special to The CJN

About five years ago, while living and working in a basement apartment in downtown Toronto, filmmaker Ari Grief suddenly had an epiphany: what would life be like if he didn't have a toilet?

Growing up in Montreal, Grief had always been a very curious and perceptive individual. He earned a bachelor's degree in English literature at McGill University, but then realized his true passion was for film and ended up studying that at Concordia University, before moving to Toronto in 1998 to complete a master's degree in film at York University.

He established his production company, Griefilm, in 1999, and he went on to create a digital feature film called 681-0638 and other projects mainly for the corporate market.

Inspired by the style of Super Size Me, a 2004 documentary about obesity in America and the possible link to fast foods, he began to research the subject of toilets and sanitation, and decided it would make an interesting subject for a documentary.

"The subject has environmental and social angles and is a universal one that everyone understands and interacts with in one way or another," Grief said.

Ari Grief says that "our toilet culture is flawed," and wants people to understand the importance of sanitation systems.

Grief went on the road to start working on his film FLUSH! Or: How I Learned To Stop Worrying and Love the Toilet.

He met with Jack Sim, founder of Singapore-based World Toilet Organization, and numerous sanitation experts who he followed around, leading him across places such as India, China, Germany, Sweden, the United Kingdom, and the United States.

He was shocked to learn that, according to the World Health Organization, 2.6 billion people worldwide, including almost one billion children, do not have access to basic sanitation.

In addition, 1.6 million deaths per year can be attributed to unsafe water, poor sanitation and lack of hygiene.

While the direst conditions are in Third World countries, in Canada, which comprises less than one per cent of the world's population and has 20 per cent of the total freshwater resources, sanitation systems are also flawed, explained Grief.

"With increasing worldwide water shortages, why do we flush our [feces] away with drinking water?" he asked.

"We spend all this energy and systems to treat and purify our water so we can drink it, and we end up flushing a lot of it down the toilet."

Environment Canada statistics indicate that up to one-third of the water used by the average Canadian family is flushed down the toilet. Some even misuse the toilet to get rid of garbage.

Outside the home, Grief has discovered that there are problems with public toilets, as well. There is a lack of toilets, especially in Toronto, and when they are available they tend to be out of the way or difficult to find due to poor signage.

"Good toilets make good business," said Grief. "If I go into a store and then have to use the bathroom, I'm out of there if there isn't one available."

Many toilets also tend to be old, dirty, and in disrepair due to poor maintenance.

"Our toilet culture is also flawed," he added, "because especially in Canada, there's a pervading toilet taboo that really anytime a toilet is mentioned is in a joke or in jest.

"Public toilets are a basic need and service and should be well maintained. We shouldn't shrug it off and laugh at it. We should stand up to the issue, but nobody really speaks to it."

Eager to help further address issues around toilets and sanitation locally and internationally, Grief co-founded the Toronto-based Canadian Toilet Organization (CTO) last month. Another local issue that the CTO is working to change is what Grief calls "potty parity," which speaks to the fact that often in large public spaces women have to wait in longer lines than men to use the bathroom.

The CTO is trying to get the building code changed so that it will be mandatory for contractors to install more receptacles in women's bathrooms than in men's, or at least put in the same number in women's as in men's bathrooms.

"Usually contractors will supply the minimum," said Grief. "Let's say the minimum is five toilets, so it'll be five in the women's bathroom and five in the men's. But then they throw in maybe another 30 urinals for the men, and now it's 35 to five."

The CTO's first international project is the construction of toilets for the village of Chack Hakim, near Phagwara in the Punjab region of India.

In such areas in the world where toilets aren't in place, some people defecate in the open or use bags that they throw away. This can lead to embarrassment, danger, disease, and can be detrimental to economy.

"Apart from technology, another problem is that when you have people who are used to open defecation, it's sometimes a challenge to convince them that they need toilets and that they will need to maintain them," said Grief. "Some people walk around with a cellphone but have no toilet.

"It's important to also educate people and change behaviour. If people are able to relieve themselves in a way that is comfortable and healthy, that will in turn affect their communities."

For more on the Canadian Toilet Organization, visit www.canadiantoilet.org. View Ari Grief's website at www.griefilm.com.

Al Qaeda drew its beliefs from four Muslim ideologues

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Osama bin Laden

Ayman al-Zawahiri

Abu Musab al-Zarqawi

Abdallah Azzam

Al Qaeda, which has cut a swath of death, destruction and fear from the battlefields of Afghanistan to the streets of New York City, has drawn its beliefs from four major figures, Osama bin Laden, Ayman al-Zawahiri, Abdallah Azzam and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. They are objects of analysis in Al Qaeda In Its Own Words (Harvard University Press), edited by two French specialists in Middle East affairs, Gilles Kepel and Jean-Pierre Milelli.

Bin Laden, a Saudi of Yemenite origin and Al Qaeda's spiritual founder, is the best known of the lot. His Egyptian second-in-command, al-Zawahiri, has been its leading thinker. Azzam, a Palestinian, is described as the "herald of jihad," while al-Zarqawi, a Jordanian of Palestinian descent, made his name in Afghanistan and Iraq battling the Soviets and Americans.

In this useful primer, selections from their writings and interviews are posted. This is supplemented by capsule biographies of the protagonists by scholars from the Institute for Political Studies in Paris.

These Islamic figures come across as dedicated ideologues and fanatics who are willing to do anything to further their cause. Bin Laden, the 17th son of a super wealthy building contractor who sired 54 children, is a prime example. He was initiated into jihad in Afghanistan in the 1980s, when the Soviet army was locked in an increasingly futile war with the mujahedeen.

Rather than being a fighter, he was a fundraiser, collecting donations from the Saudi royal family and influential Saudis, observes Omar Saghi.

In the wake of the 1991 Gulf War, he turned against Saudi Arabia and the United States, which had partially funded the mujahedeen. "Our main problem is the U.S. government, while the Saudi regime is but a branch or agent of the U.S.," he told CNN television network in an interview. "By being loyal to the U.S. regime, the Saudi regime has committed an act against Islam."

Bin Laden's anger with the Saudi monarchy stemmed from its decision to allow U.S. troops to marshall its forces on Saudi soil in the run-up to the Gulf War. In a reference to the Americans, he said, "They came… in support of the Israeli forces in occupied Palestine."

Judging by a statement he released on "Jews and Crusaders," bin Laden has Israel on his mind. Suggesting that the United States invaded Iraq to serve "the Jews' petty state" and divert attention away from Israel's "occupation of Jerusalem," he writes that the Americans have launched "a new crusade" and want to weaken Arab states so as to guarantee Israel's survival.

In a message to the American people, he claims that the United States first raised his ire by giving Israel "the green light to invade Lebanon" in 1982. "As I looked at those demolished buildings in Lebanon, it entered my mind that we should punish the oppressor in kind and destroy [his] towers."

Thomas Hegghammer, a Norwegian expert in Islamism, believes that Abdallah Azzam occupies "a central place" in the history of radical Islam and global jihad. The author of two jihadist books, The Defence of Muslim Territories and Join the Caravan, he participated in guerrilla warfare against Israel from bases in Jordan after the Six Day War.

Joining the mujahedeen, he played a pivotal role in recruiting foreign fighters and thereby internationalizing what might have been a regional conflict on the margins of the Muslim world. One of his recruits was bin Laden.

But in Hegghammer's estimation, Azzam's most lasting legacy was his contribution to radical Islamist thought and doctrine. "Azzam was successful in rejuvenating the concept of jihad among the Arab masses" and in developing a "cult of martyrdom" among extremist Sunni Islamists.

He adds, "Azzam took the first step toward a more global vision of jihad, opening the way for Osama bin Laden and Al Qaeda's total global war..."

Azzam, who was killed in Afghanistan in 1989, wrote, "The sin that our generation has committed in neglecting contemporary issues like Afghanistan [and] Palestine is graver than the sin committed by former generations who allowed former Muslim territories to fall."

Writing on al-Zawahiri, Stephane Lacroix credits him with best illustrating "the story of contemporary radical Sunni Islamism."

The scion of a rich family from Cairo, he gravitated toward the Egyptian jihadist movement while still a medical student and became "the true thinker behind the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States."

Animated by his virulent opposition to Zionism, communism and imperialism, all of which he lumped together into a single basket, he was one of the founders of the World Islamic Front for Jihad Against Jews and Crusaders.

By aligning himself with bin Laden, he shifted his priority from Egypt to the "distant enemy," the United States and its allies, including Israel.

After the terrorist events of Sept. 11, he gradually became Al Qaeda's spokesperson, denouncing the American invasion of Iraq and the treatment of prisoners at the leased U.S. military facility in Guantanamo, Cuba.

Calling for Israel's destruction, he writes, "The opportunity for the jihad movement to [liberate] Palestine is greater than ever." Condemning Palestinians for having recognized and negotiated with Israel, he sneers that Israel will leave Muslims and Arabs "crumbs."

Continuing his rant, he says, "Our Islamic movement and its jihadi vanguard… must bring the major criminals – the United States, Russia and Israel – into the battle."

Lambasting western nations and conservative Arab regimes from Saudi Arabia to Jordan, he writes, "If we consider their allegiance to the Jews and Christians, we will observe that they have transformed the Muslim countries, and especially the Arab world, into a supply base and rallying point for Jewish and Christian forces."

And in a final denunciation, he excoriates "the enemies of Islam" who forced Arab governments to recognize Israel.

The last essay, by Jean-Pierre Milelli, is on Zarqawi, whose real name was Ahmad Fadil Nazzal al-Khalkayla. A mujahedeen in Afghanistan, he was imprisoned in Jordan in 1994, charged with carrying weapons and false documents. Freed in 1999 during an amnesty declared by King Abdullah II, he returned to Afghanistan. From there, he organized attacks in Jordan.

Zarqawi played an important role in the anti-U.S. insurgency in Iraq before he was killed by American forces in 2006.

In his writings, he accuses the United States of invading Iraq "to create the State of Greater Israel from the Nile to the Euphrates," charges that Iraqi Kurds have "opened their land to the Jews," and excoriates Shiites as heretics and enemies of Islam.

The ideas that he and his fellow jihadists express in Al Qaeda In Its Own Words are chilling. Let it serve as a blood-curdling warning to those who may underestimate them.

LADINO MUSIC LEGEND FLORY JAGODA PERFORMS JUDEO-SPANISH SONGS FROM BOSNIA

Jagoda's music is a unique amalgam of Jewish, Spanish, North African and Balkan influences sung in Ladino, the ancient Judeo-Spanish language. Her performances feature authentic Sephardi songs and her own original compositions, woven together with compelling tales about the music and the lost Sephardic world of Sarajevo.

Following the Inquisition, Jews fled Spain for other Mediterranean countries, where they preserved their traditions and Ladino language while blending in the musical flavours and rhythms of their adopted countries. Jagoda was born some 80 years ago in Sarajevo, where her mother's family (Altaras) were well-known singers and musicians for generations.

A Holocaust survivor, she came to the United States in 1946. For the last six decades, her mission has been to keep alive the rich Ladino musical tradition of Bosnia's Jews. A resident of Washington, D.C., she is known worldwide as one of the few authentic performers of Ladino music.

Her performance will include her own famous Chanukah anthem Ocho Kandelikos (Eight Candles) and other seasonal songs. Her accompanists are Howard Bass (guitar), Susan Gaeta (guitar, vocals) and Eric Stein, Aleksandar Gajic and Milos Popovic of the Toronto-based musical group Beyond the Pale. CBC Radio Two will record the show for future broadcast.

Glenn Gould Studio, CBC Centre, 250 Front St. W. Tickets $20 in advance, $25 day-of show. Saturday, Dec. 6, 8 p.m. 416-872-4255, www.roythompson.com

HIKE, BIKE, JOG & RIDE ON HORSEBACK WHILE VACATIONING IN ISRAEL

Here are some great ways to keep fit during your next vacation in Israel.

Have you ever gone hiking in the Galilee? Trained guides offer tours of the Israel National Trail, which passes through some truly breathtaking natural scenery in the Lower Galilee. The terrain includes running streams and lush forests, the spring flowers of Mount Tabor and the slopes of the Carmel Mountains. www.hikeisrael.org

As for biking, Israel intends to invest about $6 million to expand the country's cycling routes over the next two years. The new Israel Cycling Trail, stretching 750 miles from the north to south of the country, will feature offshoot regional paths, including an 80-mile path around the Sea of the Galilee, a cycling route in the Acre and Krayort areas, and trails in Gilboa, Jerusalem, Be'er Sheva, Arad and along the Yarkon, Ayalon and Alexander rivers. www.goisrael.ca

You may also ride on horseback in a new park in the Tel Aviv area. Israel has embarked on a dramatic eco-friendly initiative by transforming the 2,000-acre Hiriya garbage dump on the outskirts of Tel Aviv into a park. For decades Hiriya, on the edge of Tel Aviv, was considered an ecological blight and eyesore – but no more. The soon-to-be-completed Ayalon Park will be a large metropolitan park featuring tropical gardens, green forests and hiking and horseback riding trails. www.ayalon-park.org.il.

Do you like to jog? If so, then try out Site Jogging, a new program designed for travellers wishing to discover Tel Aviv via their feet. A personal guide accompanies participants, sharing stories and connecting them to the rich history of Old Jaffa, the bohemian-chic Neve Tzedek neighbourhood and the modern Tel Aviv Marina. Tours range from 60 to 90 minutes depending on the requested difficulty level and route. More Site Jogging tours are being planned for Jerusalem and other cities in 2009. www.run-the-city.com

Two Worthwhile Websites: "Israel is unknown and misunderstood by many in the world, but trust us, it is something very special," advises a bold new website aimed at young and hip travellers. "Let us show you the cool side of Israel, away from the religion and tradition which most people instantly associate with this country… And we hope you'll like it enough to come here and see it for yourself!"

Marketing Israel has produced a bold, graphically orientated website depicting Israel as about the coolest place on the planet (which of course it is). Young people on the cutting edge of cool will find this website speaks their language. Check it out at www. touristisrael.com

Another website you will enjoy is www.aboutisrael.co.il/heb/freepage.php?id=997. Please pardon the long URL address but it's worth it. Scroll down the page to see breathtaking, moving aerial views of many exquisite tourist sites such as Jerusalem's Old City, Beit Shean, Capernaum and Mount Hermon. Its parallel English and Hebrew texts also allows visitors to brush up on their Hebrew.

A Jewish-Arab romance animates Adam's Wall

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When the then president of the United States, Ronald Reagan, visited the divided city of Berlin in the 1980s, he issued a ringing declaration. Tear down this wall, he said in a reference to the insidious Berlin Wall. As Reagan suggested, walls separate people and sow grievances, misunderstandings and conflicts.

Michael MacKenzie's feature film, Adam's Wall, which is scheduled to open in Toronto on Dec. 5, adopts a similar approach to walls.

Set in Montreal during the 2006 war in Lebanon, Adam's Wall turns on a seemingly doomed romance between a Jewish Canadian and a Lebanese Christian Arab. Their relationship, such as it is, seems destined for the dustbin. There are simply too many barriers, not the least of which is a raging war in Lebanon pitting Israel against Hezbollah.

It begins with a flashback. A vehicle carrying several passengers is stopped by Israeli troops in the West Bank. Two of the occupants, Avrum and Anita Levy, are mistaken for terrorists and shot dead. In fact, Avrum Levy is a human rights lawyer who has worked for peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

As Adam's Wall fastforwards to a winter day in Montreal 10 years later, Levy's teenaged son, Adam (Jesse Aaron Dwyre), is seen hurrying to a clarinet audition. On his way, he meets Yasmine Gibran (Flavia Bechara) at a non-violent student demonstration.

Adam, who has been brought up by his Orthodox Jewish grandfather (Gabriel Gascon), takes a shine to Yasmine. She and her father have run away from "bombs and vengeance" in Lebanon. In an unmistakable signal of affection, Yasmine gives Adam her cell phone number, yet they face an uphill struggle.

Adam's gruff grandfather is none too pleased by the romantic rumblings. He refers to Yasmine as "the Arab girl" and brands all Arabs as terrorists. Meanwhile, Yasmine's Lebanese acquaintance denounces Israel's policies.

Nonetheless, they seem made for each other. Adam is drawn to Yasmine's poetic sensibility, while she appreciates his thoughtfulness. Can they surmount the invisible wall that may yet draw them apart?

In posing this implicit question, Adam's Wall is fearless in exposing the problems that may yet undermine the bonds that bind them. Regrettably, the film lacks the tension of a first-rate drama, though the performances are understated and genuine.

Adam Levy (Jesse Aaron Dwyre) and Yasmine Gibran (Flavia Bachara).

Enemies: A Love Story is sad and hilarious

Some films age badly, while still others hold up remarkably well. Paul Mazursky's Enemies: A Love Story, which was released in 1989, falls into the second category. Adapted from Isaac Bashevis Singer's eponymous novel, Enemies will be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Society on Dec. 7 at the Al Green Theatre at 4 p.m. and again at 7:30 p.m.

Starring Ron Silver as Herman Broder, a Polish Holocaust survivor trying to put back his life in order, Mazursky's two-hour feature film is both sad and hilarious. Having emerged unscathed from the war and thinking that his wife Tamara was killed by the Nazis, Broder immigrates to the United States with Yadwiga, the Polish Catholic peasant woman who saved him.

Enemies, ably directed by Mazursky, is set in New York City in 1949, just four years after Germany's defeat. The opening scene, however, takes place during the Nazi occupation, when German soldiers and their barking dogs barge into a barn looking for hidden Jews. The camera pans on Broder, concealed in the hay, and Yadwiga, who lets out a bloodcurdling scream. Herman, in fact, is experiencing one of his regular nightmares. As he rolls out of bed, he realizes that he is on safe ground in his apartment in Cony Island.

Yadwiga (Malgorzata Zajaczkowska), now Herman's wife, lovingly tends to all his needs. She bathes him as he reads the New York Times in a tub, prepares his breakfast and attends to household chores. In short, she is utterly devoted to him.

Herman, though, takes Yadwiga for granted, and is having a torrid affair with Masha (Lena Olin), a sexually alluring fellow survivor with a Nazi tattoo on her arm. Herman's complicated personal life becomes all the more complex when his first wife, the prickly Tamara (Angelica Huston), suddenly turns up.

Herman's frenetic juggling act of infidelity, which borders on the comical and the absurd, is captured with empathetic precision by Mazursky, who appears briefly on screen as Masha's ex-husband.

The film has an intimate feel to it, due in part to Mazursky's ability to convey Herman's marital problems and knack for evoking the ambience of Coney Island and the Lower East Side.

Silver is excellent as a sex-addled, confused survivor who can't quite decide with whom he wants to spend the rest of his life. Olin exudes raw, seething sexuality, while Huston is generally a study in restraint. The standup comedian Alan King, is funny as a self-absorbed rabbi who loves to hear himself.

Though made 20 years ago, Enemies stands up to the test of time and presents an empathetic portrait of Holocaust survivors attempting to find their footing after an unfathomably terrible tragedy.

Proud 'Ashkenazi goy' Aznavour tours Canada in 2009

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The man who cheekily calls himself Paris' "Ashkenazi goy" is coming back to Canada.

Charles Aznavour, French chanteur, actor and entertainment icon to a generation, was in Toronto last month to announce his world tour, Aznavour en Liberté.

The tour will see Aznavour return to Ottawa on April 19 at the National Arts Centre, followed by a three-night run at Montreal's Place des Arts from April 21 to 23, and Toronto's Roy Thomson Hall on April 26.

The tour is being billed as an "extension" of his Farewell Tour, which began in 2006. But bidding farewell is the furthest thing from the singer's mind.

In Toronto, on a stopover from New York on Remembrance Day, Aznavour, 84, sat down with The CJN for a brief interview, conducted in French, at Roy Thomson Hall to discuss, among other things, his need to keep making music and why he feels a special affinity toward the Jewish community.

Born in Paris to artistic Christian Armenian parents – his father was an opera singer and his mother an actress – who fled their homeland in the early 1900s for France to escape the genocidal rule of the Ottoman Empire, Aznavour's family settled in the city's Jewish quarter, commonly called le Marais (The Marsh).

Charles Aznavour

It was during the Nazi-collaborative Vichy regime that an adolescent Aznavour, who by this point had many friends in the community and who could speak some broken Yiddish – his father was fluent in the language, he said – cemented his empathy for his Jewish neighbours, having been detained several times on suspicion that he himself was a Jew.

In a 1998 New York Post interview, Aznavour recalled that the Vichy authorities would often "take me to the command post. I'd show them my baptism certificate, but they didn't believe me."

He told The CJN he continues to feel connected to the Jewish community today partly due to his progeny.

Fifteen years ago, his Jewish son-in-law died suddenly, leaving behind Aznavour's daughter and 13-year-old grandson. The grandson was to have had his bar mitzvah'd that year. The death put off that plan. But Aznavour said he plans to take his grandson, now 28, to Israel next year to bar mitzvah at the Kotel to fulfil that wish.

Aznavour added that he plans on meeting with his "good friend [Israeli President Shimon] Peres" to gently take him to task over remarks Peres made in 2001 as foreign minister that downplayed the Armenian tragedy when compared with the Holocaust.

"I haven't had occasion to bring it up since then, but I'll speak to him about that. To me, genocide is genocide," Aznavour said with a smile, adding "[Peres and I] know each other well."

Aznavour said the historical narratives of both the Armenian and Jewish communities are very closely related and that currently, there is a great deal of intermarriage and amicable exchange between them in France.

"We have three prominent religions on this earth: Islam, Judaism and Christianity. And there is an enormous resemblance between all three," he said. "I believe that once and for all, the peoples of these religions must agree on one thing, to respect the belief of the other. Like I say, I'm an 'Ashkenazi goy,' and it's true that my father spoke Yiddish better even than some Jews while I was growing up in Paris," he said, laughing.

Asked what keeps his passion and motivation for his work burning at this stage of his life, Aznavour asked back, "Do you plan on retiring? No? That's good. Because retirement is the antechamber to death. If I ever retired, I would die immediately. Because the most important thing is to live life. And work is part of life. I tell people my age, if you don't work, find something interesting to do. Don't just putter around in your garden, that's ridiculous. Find something that works your soul."

Aznavour, whose wistful songs of love and life have been covered by numerous musicians and artists the world over, will have a new double album, Duos, out on Dec 9.

As the title suggests, Aznavour sings a selection of his songs in both English and French, alongside special guests who span a diverse range of styles and generations. And thanks to modern technology, he even manages to sing with friends from beyond the grave, including his mentor Edith Piaf, and contemporaries Frank Sinatra and Dean Martin.

Aznavour added that at his age, he keeps his creative juices flowing by constantly reading, watching and listening to the world around him.

"I always write what others have not," he said. "I've written about societal issues like homosexuality, drugs, ecology… everything. Now, I'm writing about immigrant communities that are in need of help, those that governments have forsaken. Communities who feel unwelcome in their adopted countries. I can't criticize governments too much, because they have a hard job. Still, something needs to be done. Issues like these open my musical horizons and allow me to write much more."

Although he continues to create new and vibrant music, it is for his earlier tunes that many of his core fans keep paying to see him sing live.

"As a trained actor and performer, you put yourself in the service of the lyrics. Even if it's a song I wrote, I forget about that and… I play the part of the song. I live that three minutes of the song," he said.

As for the future, Aznavour said that while he doesn't know precisely what he'll be doing over the next few years, he's determined to "live first and continue on."

This past July, Aznavour was named an honorary officer of the Order of Canada, a special designation reserved for non-Canadians, for his work building bridges between French communities in Canada and French communities worldwide.

"It was an honour and a pleasure to receive it," Aznavour said. "I have always felt close to Canada. But I never knew just how close the country felt towards me."

Rivka Galchen's journey to literary fame

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Rivka Galchen is in an upbeat mood these days, feeling lucky, confident and relaxed. She has felt that way since the publication of her debut novel, Atmospheric Disturbances (Harper Collins), which has garnered rave reviews in the United States, where she has lived since the age of four.

Still, the humble Toronto-born writer wonders why critics praised her comically dark novel, a complex love story set in New York City and Argentina, turning on such themes as loss, parallel worlds and a missing wife's almost perfect double, and touching on elements ranging from weather control and quantum theory to a counter-intuitive conception of space and time.

"I'm not being falsely modest," said Galchen, a 32-year-old New York-based rising literary star whose richly imaginative novel was nominated for Canada's Governor General's Award. "Some books that aren't that good get lots of attention."

Galchen, whose parents left Israel in the late 1960s and never returned, was brought up with the notion that she should aspire to be a scientist. Her late father, a distant character in the novel, was an applied mathematician who worked in meteorology, while her mother was a computer programmer.

At first, Galchen rebelled, studying literature and creative writing at Princeton University under the tutelage of her thesis advisor, famed novelist Joyce Carol Oates. But bowing to family pressure, she enrolled at the Mount Sinai School of Medicine, emerging with a medical degree five years later. Between her second and third years, she spent a satisfying year in Peru working on public health issues.

"My mom begged me, basically, to study medicine, thinking I'd be unemployed otherwise. I wanted to make her happy. I was a yalda tova, a good girl."

Eventually, she regretted her decision. "I didn't feel engaged in medicine," explained Galchen, who was recently in Toronto to promote her novel at the International Festival of Authors.

Longing to return to writing, Galchen registered for a master of fine arts degree at Columbia University. She never practised her specialty, psychiatry, thereby disappointing her mother.

She now believes that her enrolment in Columbia's MFA program was like a rite of passage. "To become an adult, you have to displease your parents," she noted, adding that her mother nevertheless wished her well. "She was very nice," said Galchen in an interview.

In retrospect, she does not think she wasted time at medical school. "Education is never a waste. Medicine is a part of my identity today. It made me into a stronger person."

To some degree, Columbia formed Galchen, who taught an undergraduate course in essay writing there. "I loved Columbia," said Galchen, a soft-spoken person whose sentences occasionally end with an endearing giggle. "I made very close friends. I read a lot more deeply. Before Columbia, I felt desperately behind in my knowledge of literature. No one had ever told me about Ulysses."

Armed with a fellowship, Galchen began Atmospheric Disturbances in the autumn of 2004. She composed much of it in a favourite hangout, the Hungarian Pastry Shop, which her father once frequented. It is five blocks from her apartment in Manhattan, which she shares with her husband, Aaron Harnly, a computer scientist.

"You can sit there all day with a $2 cup of coffee and refills. The macaroons are amazing, and the atmosphere is shabby in a nice way. The clientele is mixed. In the morning, elderly Jews sit there discussing politics, and in the afternoon, it is filled with Columbia students."

She had no problems writing Atmospheric Disturbances. "It very much wrote itself," she explained. "It didn't develop in the direction of my plans."

She had no agent when she started. But after hiring one, everything fell magically into place. She submitted her manuscript on a Thursday, and on the following Tuesday, it had been accepted for publication.

The reviews were nothing short of ecstatic. "Hilarious and daring," exulted one reviewer. "Playful yet profound," observed another one.

Having hit pay dirt with her inaugural book, Galchen is far more self-confident than she was a few years ago. "Writing is not a stable field," she said, echoing her mother's sentiments. "But now I feel a little ground under my feet."

Rivka Galchen

Much to Galchen's relief, her mother liked Atmospheric Disturbances. "She doesn't read fiction, but she heard from friends that it was a good book. She thought it was very realistic, which is the last word I'd use to describe it."

In fact, her virtuoso novel bridges the gap between literature and science. "I'm interested in revealing the poetry of scientific language," said Galchen, who has been drawn to science since childhood. "My parents encouraged me to become a scientist," she recalled. "My father thought that science was the noblest endeavour, but he and my mom had respect for the humanities."

Her parents, both sabras, left Tel Aviv in 1969 as newlyweds. Tzvi Galchen, originally from a moshav, wanted to complete a post-doctoral degree at the University of Toronto. He and his wife assumed they would return to Israel after Canada, but instead they moved to the United States.

Galchen's memories of Toronto are hazy today, but she remembers the pre-school she attended in a church.

After Toronto, the Galchens went to Norman, Okla., via Boulder, Colo. He accepted a position at the University of Oklahoma, while she landed a job at the National Severe Storms Laboratory.

"They had no idea where Oklahoma was," she chuckled. "Oklahoma was not the end of the world, but you could see it from there. It was safe and cheap. My dad was happy there." (He died of a heart attack in 1994 at the age of 53.)

Galchen, her parents and older brother, Oren – an investor in New York City today – were virtually the only Jews in Norman. "It was the ultimate Jewish experience. We were in exile. It gave me a sense of homelessness."

During this formative period, she and her family visited Israel almost annually. "I'm very attached to Israel. For better or worse, Israel feels very personal."

Currently, Galchen is finishing her second novel, tentatively titled The Nature Theater of Oklahoma, which revolves around a false religious prophet who heads a populist movement.

Looking ahead, she said her third novel may draw on material in an unpublished novel on pre-state Israel she wrote as a thesis at Princeton.

"It was about my father's parents coming to Palestine in 1918," she disclosed. "It wasn't very good. I was young and didn't understand how to construct a novel or form a character. I hadn't come under enough writerly influences. But I learned a lot in writing it. It encouraged me to write."

And now, with Atmospheric Disturbances behind her, Galchen has come full circle.

Reeling in musicians gone adrift

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Resa's Pieces band in action

Back in 2000, Resa Kochberg had a "eureka!" moment which led to her giving the gift of music back to her community.

Equipped with a bachelor of music education degree majoring in flute from the University of Toronto, the former music instructor for the Scarborough Board of Education and private piano teacher, had just returned to the world of music after taking time off to raise her children.

Once reconnected to the world of notes and staves, Kochberg realized that there were potentially many others out there who had abandoned their instruments due to life circumstances and who now longed to return to the playing that once gave them so much joy.

So she founded the Resa's Pieces Concert Band to help them "return to playing band instruments that they hadn't touched for years," Kochberg told The CJN in a recent interview.

The band derives its membership from amateur applicants who are then vetted by Kochberg, the major qualifications being an ability to read music and keep up with rehearsals, she said.

Now in its eighth year, Resa's Pieces has been functioning as a voluntary endeavour, playing just a few shows a year to community organizations around town and asking a moderate membership fee from its participants.

Kochberg said this year she applied for nonprofit status for the band after forming a full board of directors on its behalf.

After seeing a surge in applications in recent years – the band has grown to 33 members from the original 16 – Kochberg was feeling slightly overwhelmed by her multiple roles as band leader, planner and organizer, so she enlisted the help of an eager band-mate, Ruth Fishman, who is now the band's president as well as its clarinetist.

"We really gear for Jewish audiences," Kochberg said, citing staple song choices as Shalom Aleichem, the theme from Fiddler on the Roof, Hatikvah and others as the band's meat and potatoes.

Other tunes include selections of Disney songs, movie themes, Broadway tunes and classical music.

For years, the band has played to sell-out audiences at venues around Toronto such as the Leah Posluns Theatre and various shuls, said Kochberg.

She credits Resa's Pieces' success to the passion of the band members, all of whom are dedicated to playing the best music they can while making friends and having fun with the music.

"It's exhilarating," Fishman said. "It's the best night of my week. We have [musicians] from every age, from 25 to 89... and we're all a bunch of kids at heart."

Kochberg concurred, adding: "Music stimulates your brain and I think people get into a different headspace [while playing]. We work as a group towards a common goal."

Resa's Pieces holds weekly rehearsals at York Mills Collegiate in the run-up to their concerts.

Kochberg is on sabbatical this year to study conducting and flute at the University of Toronto and the Royal Conservatory "to up my skills," she said.

Over the next year, the band will play three times, with their first concert scheduled this Sunday, 1 p.m., at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue for a Chanukah-themed performance.

This year has also seen a splinter group branch out from the main band. Klez-Connection, a small ensemble dedicated to klezmer music will play this year's annual closing concert with Resa's Pieces at the Leah Posluns Theatre on June 2, 2009.

Fishman, who has been with Resa's Pieces since its inception, called the band's yearly closing concert at the theatre "magical" and Kochberg said her reward for the hours of rehearsals is just "seeing the smiles on everyone's faces and seeing a sense of accomplishment" in her musicians.

"As long as they're proud of what they've done, it's just great. And the audience really feels it," she said, adding that most of the Resa's Pieces players have children who come out to see their parents put on the show.

"They come and they kvell," she said.

Kochberg jokingly called it "payback" for all the times the parents have gone out to support their offspring.

Though any instrumentalist is "welcome to apply", the band currently has positions vacant for a percussionist, baritone, oboist, trombonist, clarinettist and French horn, she said.

For more information about Resa's Pieces, contact membership@resaspieces.org.

Israeli-Canadian gets chance with the Moose

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — On the last Monday of October, Oren Eizenman was still with the Manitoba Moose, working out with the American Hockey League (AHL) club and trying to crack the lineup of the talent-laden team.

Though highly regarded by the Moose, Eizenman was sent back to Fresno of the East Coast Hockey League (ECHL) by the Winnipeg-based team with the expectation that he'll get a chance later in the season. In 10 games with the Fresno Falcons, he notched three goals and added 10 assists, leaving him tied for second in team scoring.

Like Jewish players who preceded him – Cory Pecker, a forward, and netminders Dov Grumet-Morris and Robert Gherson – Eizenman was hoping Winnipeg's pro team would be a giant stepping-stone to the National Hockey League.

Practising with the Moose before being sent down, Eizenman, 23, looked to be working harder and skating faster than any of the other pro skaters.

The Toronto-born kid was the last one off the ice at the end of practice because he was working overtime with new assistant coach Jay Wells, a former NHL defenceman.

I managed to corral the six-foot, 180-pound Eizenman, who played four years of the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) Division 1 college hockey at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute (RPI) in Boston, as he left the ice heading for the dressing room and inquired why he was kept after school.

"I'm just coming off an injury, and I just got cleared to play yesterday. They want to make sure I'm in shape," said the sweaty and panting good-natured Eizenman. "I went through training camp and played in the season opener and then was injured, which set me back a little bit."

Oren Eizenman

It was an "upper body injury," a kind of generic double talk to confuse opponents who might try to take advantage of Eizenman when he returns to the lineup.

Last season, the flashy centre played mainly in the ECHL with the Fresno, where in only 53 games he managed 27 goals and added 39 assists. One game with the Milwaukee Admirals and seven with the Worcester Icecats of the AHL rounded out his first pro season, following his NCAA tour of duty during which, in 129 total games, he scored 37 goals and had 62 assists.

Eizenman realizes that the jump from the ECHL to the AHL will be a real challenge, yet for him, it's doable. "It's just a difference in skill level. Here there's more speed, the guys are quicker and stronger and their positional play is better," he said candidly.

His face lit up with immense pride when I inquired about his background. He spoke of his family: brothers Erez, 26, and Alon 29, along with his Israeli parents, father Moshe and mother Ronit.

"My grandparents are European Jews who moved to Israel when times got tough in Europe. That's where my Jewish roots come from," he said. "In my childhood, I lived one-half in Israel and one-half in Canada, moving back and forth because my dad had business in Israel as well as in Canada. When I got to be six or seven, we moved permanently to Canada but still spent summers in Israel."

As time passed, all of the boys became involved in hockey. Alon, at Penn State for four years, plus a year in France. Erez also played competitive hockey. All three have played with the Israeli national team.

"When I was growing up, hockey was just something that was fun. We didn't take it very seriously. As I got older, I began to see the possibilities of going to school and earning a scholarship. I thought I could get to very good schools through hockey," he added.

Not unlike other Jewish families, education was always foremost in the minds of Moshe and Ronit. "Yeah, academics are very serious in my family," Oren said. "My mom is a teacher, and my dad is a professor of biomedical engineering at the University of Toronto.

"My brother Erez just completed his MBA at the University of Toronto and was first in his class, and my oldest brother Alon just started working for the biggest law firm in Canada. I completed my undergraduate work in the business programs at RPI, one of the top schools in the United States. For now, I'll just focus on hockey and my parents are really supportive of that, which is great."

Eizenman crossed paths with Pecker, when they played together with the Ontario Hockey League Erie Otters. As for Grumet-Morris, Eizenman played against him in the World Jewish Hockey Championships in Israel in the summer of 2007.

Although he wasn't drafted by an NHL team, there appeared to be some interest in Eizenman because of his accomplishments in Fresno. The New York Rangers invited him to a midsummer prospects training camp and offered him a contract in the system. Not believing it was a good fit for him, he sought out the Canucks and Moose and was signed to a pro tryout pact after he impressed the powers-that-be at their rookie camp.

I approached Moose head coach Scott Arniel following practice and his first comment to me was: "I know, I know, you're asking about the Jewish kid, aren't you?" Arniel said, laughing good-naturedly. "Just last week, he was asking us where the synagogues are in this town on your High Holidays."

So where does Eizenman fit in with the club? "He showed at our rookie camp very well, and he earned this opportunity," Arniel said. "He's a guy that has some good offence and is a smart kid. He can be used in a lot of situations, on the power play, faceoffs, and penalty killing. He'll get his chances. We have a seven-game road trip coming up. "

Eizenman dressed for two of the first four games of the seven-game road swing and was sent back to Fresno for further seasoning. Manitoba is a stacked club this year and has won eight of its first 10 games. Eizenman was in tough.

Only time will tell if he can overcome the odds, but did you know that in Yiddish, the name Eizenman means "Iron Man"?

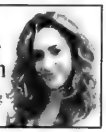
There's a big challenge coming

Sandie Benitah
20Something



I've been in the workforce for 13 years now and the message has always been the same: take risks and reach for the moon, because the opportunities are out there for the taking.

So far, I've had no reason to doubt the message. But then again, my peers and I have never been faced with an economic crisis like the one hitting the world today.

Last time there was a recession, I was just a kid. As long as my weekly allowance kept coming, I had no reason to believe things were hard outside my little world.

Just two years ago, Canada was boasting its lowest unemployment rate ever. There was no reason to fear risk, because it was almost guaranteed we'd be able to find something as a fallback plan.

We've been spoiled, but now it looks like we're about to learn a tough lesson.

Right now, most twentysomethings are in the middle of their careers. I, for one, feel desperately unprepared to deal with the cutbacks and restrictions that companies are imposing. I don't know what to expect, or how to behave in such uncertain times.

This couldn't have come at a worse time.

Lately, I've been feeling restless with work and have been looking for a change of pace. For the last two years, I've had a company on the side that I would love to develop into a full-time gig.

Just when I decided the time was right to venture on my own and pursue this new goal, word spread at the office that cost-cutting measures were being put in place.

In other words, job cuts and a hiring freeze.

"Not exactly the right time to be taking risks," advised a friend of mine.

With word that companies across the economy are implementing similar measures, I also understood that this wasn't the time to be looking for a new job, either.

It's not just me panicking. One friend of mine cancelled a long-awaited trip to Australia. Another friend decided to buy a much smaller house than what she had originally wanted.

We could look to our parents for advice on how to handle the situation, but I think that today's young professionals are facing a different kind of challenge.

Our parents, the baby boomers, certainly had it tough growing up, as most of them watched their parents recover from the Great Depression and a wartime economy.

While the 1960s were a time of significant economic expansion and affluence, North America suffered a recession in the '70s because of an oil crisis, and again in the '80s after another oil shock and more inflation. After a recession also marked the beginning of the '90s, it didn't take long for the economy to finally turn up for a steady period of time.

This is when we came in.

It seems as if there has never been another generation to strike it as rich as quickly as we have. We have had every opportunity handed to us from an early age. And while most of us have made good use of those opportunities, I can't help but wonder what we've learned along the way that will help us hold on to them during these challenging times.

We always hear about visionaries who have found ways to succeed where others fail miserably. It will be interesting to see how the people of our generation – people who have mostly never been told "no" when it comes to opportunity – find a way to overcome this challenge.

Maybe a generation used to not taking no for an answer is just what this economy needs.

POTATO LATKES WITH CAVIAR

- 3 russet potatoes, peeled and finely grated
- 1 leek, finely chopped
- 1/4 c chopped fresh parsley
- sour cream
- 1 egg, beaten
- vegetable oil, for frying
- caviar, to taste

1. Finely grate potatoes. Put potatoes into a sieve or colander over a bowl. Press into sides of colander so the liquid drains into the bowl. Pour off the liquid, reserving the thick starch left behind in the bottom of the bowl. Add potatoes to the bowl and toss to coat them with the starch.
2. Using a spoon or your hands, mix the egg, leek and parsley in with potato. Season with salt and pepper and form into palm-size patties.
3. In large skillet, heat 1/4" vegetable oil over medium-high heat until almost smoking. Fry latkes until brown and crispy, about 5 minutes per side. Set aside on a paper towel drain. Top with dollop of sour cream and caviar.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

I'm writing because we're at our wits end with our 17-year-old daughter. She's been dating her 16-year-old boyfriend for nine months. He is controlling, immature, unemployed and his family may be a bad influence.

Ever since my daughter hooked up with this boy, she has lost all but one of her friends, because nobody likes him. He has to know where she is at all times, and he calls her obsessively when they're not together. This boy doesn't work, so when they go out, she either pays for him, or he comes to our house. If I cut off her allowance, things get even worse, and my daughter becomes more depressed and angry at us. We've tried to talk to her, but she can't see our point of view, and if we forbid her to see him, she storms to her room, slams the door, and cries. If we do let her see him, our rules are broken. Please help.

Teenage Trouble

Dear Teenage Trouble

Teenage years are the transition from childhood to adulthood, which means the way you have disciplined your daughter in the past won't work now. Although she is still a child in your eyes, she needs to be dealt with like a young woman entering adulthood.

It would be a perfect world if we could make kids learn from our experiences and mistakes. Most of us have made our share. Your daughter has to be allowed to make and learn from her own mistakes. Your job as parents is to keep her safe, guide her thinking and keep the lines of communication open.

If she is being controlled by this boy, she may have a self-esteem issue. She may be lacking the confidence to set parameters for fear of losing him. This is where you come in. The values you instilled in her as she was growing up will come into play. Show her what a beautiful, worthy young woman she is. She needs be able to feed off what she sees at home and what she truly feels inside. Above all, you must let her make her own mistakes and be there to pick up the pieces. You must back off while staying closer than ever – the ultimate balancing act.

There are resources to help you and your daughter through this time, such as counselling, books and support groups. Don't hesitate to use them.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN., email: eb@cjnews.com. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional

The round, red apple

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Dedicated to Yishai, my cousin, an awesome young Jewish warrior and a commander in the Israeli army. Thank you for protecting the Jewish people.

URBAN WRITER

Sometimes the world can take my breath away.

I've watched the sun set. I've watched the sun rise. I am a fan of both but prefer sunset, because I am more devoted to the night, a time with peaceful, ebony tones and the quiescent whispering volume. The sunrise introduces the chaos of our awakened state when stock market tickers tick and cranes swing high, while the sunset ushers in a backdrop for the poet to write and the mind to rest. Only thieves and highwaymen ruin those hours of complete shadows.

Recently, my breath was taken away once again through my discovery of the day-to-day phenomena and the magical secrets found within and surrounding soil. To know this beauty is to be inspired to save it.

Consider the following scientific information that I learned in Green for Life, written by Victoria Boutenko. This important book was recommended by my good friend Burt Serfaty, who is helping me get healthier.

Boutenko, a chemist and advocate of raw food and green smoothies (blended drinks containing green leaves, vegetables and fruits), writes masterfully and simply about the symbiotic relationship between the sun, the soil and its by-products.

She explains the shrewdness and sagacity of soil, and its friendship with plants. "When plants die, it may look like they just fall on the ground and rot, getting eaten by multitudes of bugs and worms," she says, "however researchers were shocked to discover dead plants get consumed only by particular bacteria and fungi."

Oh, this is so magnificent! Boutenko teaches us that plants instinctively attract to their own rotting, only micro-organisms and earthworms that "manufacture advantageous minerals for the soil where the plant sibling will grow." "One-way" plants do this by directing more sugars to their roots. That's why carrots and potatoes are much sweeter than the rest of the plant. Beautiful!

It appears soil and plants are thinking, sharing and cohabiting. It would be best if we humans were relentlessly conscious of the precious plant and soil camaraderie, joined their friendship and stayed afar when tempted by greed. God took the newly created human "and placed him in the Garden of Eden, to cultivate it and to guard it." (Genesis 2:15)

So God created the world in six days. On the third day, he commanded the earth to bring forth grass, plants and fruit-bearing trees. And He instilled in those living things the objective of continuing their species.

This required the assurance of appropriate living conditions. Therefore, on that third day, most fruits were created round; so they are able to roll away (once fallen) and begin a new existence. Boutenko writes, "For the same reason, plants have learned to make their fruit colourful, palatable and nutritious to ensure its consumers not only eat one fruit but continue to return for more. This strategy works very well and all fruits get eaten."

She adds that plants keep their fruits monochrome in colour, unappealing, and often have an offensive taste until the seeds are ripe, so nobody wastes them before they have matured.

I know the octopus has three hearts and that the Night Butterfly has ears on its wings so it can avoid bats. Apples are round. I now know why. Through all this, I have fallen more deeply in love with the earth and its soil. It has taken my breath away. I want us to save it.

Showdown in Hebron as settlers evicted

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

HEBRON, West Bank — It looked like a modern-day version of a medieval siege: Israeli paramilitary border police wielding batons and shields burst from vans, charging their way into a house in this tense, divided city.

The violent eviction last Thursday ended one standoff between Jewish settlers and the Israeli government but spurred another.

After more than 200 settlers were hauled away from the cavernous four-storey building by security forces using stun grenades and tear gas, dozens of settler youths fanned out across Hebron attacking Palestinians and setting olive groves ablaze. One settler shot two Palestinians outside their family home. The footage was broadcast by Israeli TV stations.

Earlier in the day, David Wilder, a spokesperson for Hebron's Jewish community – an island of several hundred Jews living in fortress-like compounds in the midst of more than 150,000 Palestinians – warned that the house's evacuation would not pass silently. He spoke as Israeli police nearby scuffled with a group of teenage girls during the final throes of the evacuation of the disputed house.

"The people here were brutal," Wilder said of Israel's police. "And I think there will be a price to pay for it."

The notion of exacting a price for the evacuation of settlers in the West Bank is the cornerstone of a new policy by some radical Jewish settlers to spread mayhem in response to any eviction attempt by the Israeli authorities. Dubbed "price tag," the policy aims to spread thin and exhaust Israeli security forces.

At stake is nothing less than the future of the West Bank, Israel and a Palestinian state, settlers say, with some determined to oppose any Jewish withdrawal from the Holy Land – by force, if necessary.

"We are ready for battle and we are getting ready for battle," said Baruch Marzel,

Torontonians remember Holtzbergs

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Although they were cousins, Rabbi Yosef Holtzberg is old enough to be Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg's father. He recalls the late Mumbai rabbi as a six-month-old infant and as a precocious adolescent growing up in Crown Heights, N.Y., a quiet boy with his nose always in a book.

Rav Yosef's last contact with his young cousin came just before Rosh Hashanah, when he received a call to wish him a happy new year.

"Gabi" was always a serious young man, concerned with spiritual matters, Rav Yosef said. Even on his last visit to Toronto seven years ago, which included a side trip to Niagara Falls, "he was basically looking to see me, talk to me. He was not into material things. He was always into helping other people."

Rav Yosef's recollections came a few days after his 29-year-old cousin, along with his pregnant wife, Rivkah, and four others were murdered by Islamist gunmen in Nariman House, the Chabad outreach facility they ran in the Indian commercial centre of Mumbai.

They were killed on the first day of the terrorist assault in which close to 200 people died, and despite media reports that they were tortured, Rav Yosef has it on good authority they were not. It appears Gavriel and Rivkah were shot fairly early in the attack without the kind of abuse being rumoured. Rav Yosef's source for this information is his brother-in-law, Yossi Weinberg, a member of ZAKA, the Israeli organization that gathers the remains of terror victims for proper Jewish burial. Weinberg was part of a ZAKA team that was dispatched to Mumbai to gather the remains of Jewish victims.

Rav Yosef spoke to his brother-in-law afterward and, "as for what I know, he did not struggle. He was shot immediately." Neither Gavriel nor his wife was tortured. "It was done quickly," he said.

The News in Brief

Canada

Judge Cleared

TORONTO — A judge who became involved in a dispute over a development in his neighbourhood will likely retain his job after the Canadian Judicial Council ruled he shouldn't be removed for misconduct, and said it will recommend as much to the federal justice minister. In a 17-4 decision, the council overruled its own inquiry panel in the case of Ontario Superior Court Judge Ted Matlow, 68, who was fighting a development project in the Forest Hill area of Toronto. It said Matlow, a judge for 27 years, was guilty of misconduct and used "intemperate language" in criticizing the project in letters and to the media, and that he shouldn't have acted as legal adviser to his neighbours. Matlow was ordered to write apologies to those affected by his actions, attend a seminar on judicial ethics and seek advice before entering another public debate.

Moses Gets His Way

TORONTO — Moses Znaimer, the founder of MuchMusic and Citytv, was honoured Dec. 4 when a part of Queen Street West in Toronto was renamed in his honour. The stretch of Queen, between John and Duncan streets, site of the iconic MuchMusic building, was dubbed Moses Znaimer Way in a ceremony sponsored by CTVGlobemedia and the city.

World

Academic Turns 100

PARIS — French anthropologist Claude Levi-Strauss was honoured on his 100th birthday. In a Nov. 28 tribute, UNESCO head Koichiro Matsuura called Levi-Strauss "one of the greatest thinkers of the 20th century" who "changed our understanding of the world." Many publications and other events marked the centennial in France. Levi-Strauss was born into a Jewish family on Nov. 28, 1908. He fled France and spent World War II in New York. Among his best-known books are Structural Anthropology and The Savage Mind.

Carter Writes Book

ATLANTA — Jimmy Carter has written a new book about Mideast peace. The former U.S. president told his Atlanta-based Carter Center that We Can Bring Peace to the Holy Land will come out after president-elect Barack Obama takes office next month. Carter otherwise wouldn't discuss the book. He spoke of Israel's "persecution of the Palestinians" while on a panel last week that concluded a two-day seminar at the Carter Center on human rights. His controversial 2006 book, Palestine: Peace not Apartheid, likened Israeli settlement policies to apartheid and accused pro-Israel groups of muzzling debate in the United States.

Harper Honoured For Pro-Israel Stance

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Stephen Harper was honoured last week by a leading Jewish umbrella group for his government's support of Israel.

The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations gave Harper its inaugural International Leadership Award. Thornhill MP Peter Kent, minister of state of foreign affairs (Americas), accepted the award for Harper on Dec. 3 in New York.

The group said it was expressing appreciation for Canada's "courageous stands" on next year's so-called Durban II anti-racism conference, which Canada became the first nation to boycott earlier this year.

It also lauded Canada's "support for Israel and [its] efforts at the United Nations against incitement and... delegitimization, where [it has] taken a role in the forefront," said Malcolm Hoenlein, the group's executive vice-chairman. However, a published report said this year marks the first since Harper became prime minister in 2006 that Canada "has not incrementally shifted" its UN votes toward Israel on Mideast issues.

Anti-Israel Carolling

LONDON — An Anglican church in London hosted an evening of anti-Israel Christmas carols on Nov. 26. The "Bethlehem Now: Nine Alternative Lessons and Carols for Palestine" event, sponsored by a group called Jews for Boycotting Israeli Goods & Open Bethlehem, took place at St. James Church in London's West End. Funds raised, at $15 per ticket, went to Bethlehem charities. After complaints from the current and past Archbishop of Canterbury, and Jewish groups, the church's rector said he'd "think twice" before hosting a similar event in the future.

Indian, Jewish groups honour Mumbai dead

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Indo-Canadian and Jewish communities, as well as about 70 multifaith and multi-ethnic groups, gathered Sunday for a memorial service in honour of the victims of the Nov. 26 terror attacks in Mumbai.

The rally, which attracted a capacity crowd in the large hall at the International Centre in Mississauga, was organized by the Canada India Foundation and the Indo-Canada Chamber of Commerce, with the support of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy and Canadian Jewish Congress.

It began with the singing of the Indian and Canadian national anthems, and went on to feature seven children who each recited a short poem about peace.

"Peace is quite calm and happy. If we had an election, we should all vote for peace," said one.

Another said that we need to live in a place where all people live with respect and tolerance. "My dream includes people from all religions learning from each other. How wonderful if we could work together."

One boy said he was appearing on behalf of all children. "I urge the adults to unite [in order] to make the world a better place."

After a non-denominational prayer and a moment of silence, a video presentation highlighted worldwide terrorist attacks, beginning with 9/11 and moving on to attacks in Israel, and those in London, England, Bali and Madrid.

As well, speaker after speaker stood up to condemn the attacks.

Israel Consul General Amir Gissin said that our changing world now has two coalitions, the coalition of the extreme and the coalition of the moderates. "It is not a religious question, but a political question. The coalition of the victims of terror has a long way to go until it is united and strong."

Keynote speaker Ujjal Dosanjh, MP and former premier of British Columbia, said that terror has no country, no nationality or no religion. "Terrorism and violence are absolutely unacceptable as a way of resolving issues."

Guests were asked to light a candle for the victims when they entered the hall, and during the service, 100 representatives of community groups, each lit a candle in the name of one of the terror victims.

Also on the weekend, a candlelight vigil in solidarity with the people and nation of India was organized by the Indian Overseas Congress of Canada. Participating in the event were such community leaders as Bernie Farber, president of Canadian Jewish Congress; Asha Luthra, president of the Indo-Canadian Chamber of Commerce; and Jim Kaygiannis, MP for Scarborough/Agincourt.

The 'real' threat to Israel

From the editor's desk

When discussion turns to the many threats Israel faces, even the most moderately informed individual is able to pull from the familiar list.

For example, there is the threat to Israel's very existence from a nuclear-armed Iran.

There is the threat to Israel's citizens from the planners and perpetrators of terrorism and violence such as Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah, Al Qaeda and their many like-minded fellow travellers.

There is the threat to Israel's Jewish and democratic nature from those who advocate that there must be only one state for Jews and Arabs or from those who advocate Israel must incorporate all West Bank Arabs against their will within its borders.

There is also the threat to Israel's broad acceptance within the international community of nations from hard-core ideologues of the left and the right who regard Israel's creation 60 years ago as an original sin and the "root cause" of Arab alienation from the western world.

It is not a short list. Most of us would be able to add other items to it.

In Israel, however, a large number of people would say that the "real" threats to the country are internal, not external to the state.

This was precisely the message at one of the seminar-like breakout sessions at the recent United Jewish Communities General Assembly (GA) in Jerusalem.

Israel Prize-winner Dov Lautman, president of the Chai-Israel Education Association, said that "the danger in Israel is not Hamas or Hezbollah, but the [socio-economic] gaps in Israeli society."

He was referring specifically to the gaps that arose due to the disparity in the quality and level of education available to children throughout the country. The session at which he spoke was called "Education in Israel: Restoring the Qualitative Edge."

The quality of education in Israel was on the minds of a great many people at the GA.

It may surprise, if not shock, many readers to learn that in the past few years, Israeli students have shown poor results in virtually every category of testing conducted by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD).

"Today in any international comparison in any subject, we are at the bottom of the western and developed world," Knesset education committee chair Rabbi Michael Melchior told the audience.

He also told the gathering that "Jewish identity" in education was a problem, too.

"More and more secular students are identifying themselves as Israeli and not Jewish. Haredi students are identifying themselves as Jewish and not Israeli. This is more dangerous than any danger from the outside, Melchior said.

The next day at the GA, Stanley Fischer, the president of the Bank of Israel, also cited the declining quality of the country's education system as one of the "serious, longer term challenges to Israel's economy" along with the level of poverty in the country, the need to maintain the country's edge in high-tech innovation and the need to attain peace with the country's neighbours.

He, too, referred to the poor performance of Israeli students in international standardized testing published by the OECD as irrefutable evidence that the overall level of education had deteriorated. "The economy will be severely degraded in the future unless the educational problems are solved," Fischer warned. The problem, however, according to Fischer was not in the country's overall expenditures on education. Rather, it was "in the fact that there are four different school systems." He was referring to the secular, national religious, haredi and Arab systems.

In addition to the disjointed and duplicated expenses that arise as a result of the factional and fractured nature of the country's educational structure, Fischer pointed out that the pay for teachers and for researchers in the higher institutions of learning was very poor. "We have to find a way of improving education in this country and of maintaining the high quality of senior institutes of learning," he concluded somewhat urgently.

Merely moments after Fischer left the stage, Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu took his turn addressing the GA. In his remarks he, too, identified the need to improve the education system as one of the three key domestic issues in his election platform, along with dealing with the increase in violent crime and strengthening the economy.

He offered a five-point plan for "fixing" the education system:

- The quality of teachers must be improved. This can be done, he suggested by paying higher salaries and by establishing higher entrance standards for people to qualify as teachers.
- Weaker children in the system must be offered help immediately.
- Principals must be allowed to manage their own schools.
- The curriculum must concentrate on core learning subjects.
- The curriculum must include the teaching of values such as "love of country, Jewish history, heritage and tradition."

It is counter-intuitive that the People of the Book in Israel have been ignoring the books. Yet the evidence suggests indeed that is the sad case. But it seems that the national agenda in Israel will soon be changing to bring the people back at least to their schoolbooks

ISRAELI WRITER WINS NOBEL PRIZE

On Dec. 10, 1966, Israeli novelist Shmuel Yosef Agnon shared the Nobel Prize for literature with German Jewish author Nelly Sachs. Agnon, who immigrated to Palestine from Russia in 1908, was the first Israeli writer to win the coveted award. At the Nobel ceremony in Stockholm, Agnon, a central figure in modern Hebrew fiction, said, "As a result of the historic catastrophe in which Titus of Rome destroyed Jerusalem, and Israel was exiled from its land, I was born in one of the cities of the exile. But I always regarded myself as one who was born in Jerusalem." Among Agnon's novels were The Bridal Canopy, Only Yesterday and Shira, which was published posthumously. Agnon, a resident of Jerusalem, died Feb. 17, 1970.

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

HEBRON, West Bank — It looked like a modern-day version of a medieval siege: Israeli paramilitary border police wielding batons and shields burst from vans, charging their way into a house in this tense, divided city.

The violent eviction last Thursday ended one standoff between Jewish settlers and the Israeli government but spurred another.

After more than 200 settlers were hauled away from the cavernous four-storey building by security forces using stun grenades and tear gas, dozens of settler youths fanned out across Hebron attacking Palestinians and setting olive groves ablaze. One settler shot two Palestinians outside their family home. The footage was broadcast by Israeli TV stations.

Earlier in the day, David Wilder, a spokesperson for Hebron's Jewish community – an island of several hundred Jews living in fortress-like compounds in the midst of more than 150,000 Palestinians – warned that the house's evacuation would not pass silently. He spoke as Israeli police nearby scuffled with a group of teenage girls during the final throes of the evacuation of the disputed house.

"The people here were brutal," Wilder said of Israel's police. "And I think there will be a price to pay for it."

The notion of exacting a price for the evacuation of settlers in the West Bank is the cornerstone of a new policy by some radical Jewish settlers to spread mayhem in response to any eviction attempt by the Israeli authorities. Dubbed "price tag," the policy aims to spread thin and exhaust Israeli security forces.

At stake is nothing less than the future of the West Bank, Israel and a Palestinian state, settlers say, with some determined to oppose any Jewish withdrawal from the Holy Land – by force, if necessary.

"We are ready for battle and we are getting ready for battle," said Baruch Marzel,

Torontonians remember Holtzbergs

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Although they were cousins, Rabbi Yosef Holtzberg is old enough to be Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg's father. He recalls the late Mumbai rabbi as a six-month-old infant and as a precocious adolescent growing up in Crown Heights, N.Y., a quiet boy with his nose always in a book.

Rav Yosef's last contact with his young cousin came just before Rosh Hashanah, when he received a call to wish him a happy new year.

"Gabi" was always a serious young man, concerned with spiritual matters, Rav Yosef said. Even on his last visit to Toronto seven years ago, which included a side trip to Niagara Falls, "he was basically looking to see me, talk to me. He was not into material things. He was always into helping other people."

Rav Yosef's recollections came a few days after his 29-year-old cousin, along with his pregnant wife, Rivkah, and four others were murdered by Islamist gunmen in Nariman House, the Chabad outreach facility they ran in the Indian commercial centre of Mumbai.

They were killed on the first day of the terrorist assault in which close to 200 people died, and despite media reports that they were tortured, Rav Yosef has it on good authority they were not. It appears Gavriel and Rivkah were shot fairly early in the attack without the kind of abuse being rumoured. Rav Yosef's source for this information is his brother-in-law, Yossi Weinberg, a member of ZAKA, the Israeli organization that gathers the remains of terror victims for proper Jewish burial. Weinberg was part of a ZAKA team that was dispatched to Mumbai to gather the remains of Jewish victims.

Rav Yosef spoke to his brother-in-law afterward and, "as for what I know, he did not struggle. He was shot immediately." Neither Gavriel nor his wife was tortured. "It was done quickly," he said.

The News in Brief

Canada

Judge Cleared

TORONTO — A judge who became involved in a dispute over a development in his neighbourhood will likely retain his job after the Canadian Judicial Council ruled he shouldn't be removed for misconduct, and said it will recommend as much to the federal justice minister. In a 17-4 decision, the council overruled its own inquiry panel in the case of Ontario Superior Court Judge Ted Matlow, 68, who was fighting a development project in the Forest Hill area of Toronto. It said Matlow, a judge for 27 years, was guilty of misconduct and used "intemperate language" in criticizing the project in letters and to the media, and that he shouldn't have acted as legal adviser to his neighbours. Matlow was ordered to write apologies to those affected by his actions, attend a seminar on judicial ethics and seek advice before entering another public debate.

Moses Gets His Way

TORONTO — Moses Znaimer, the founder of MuchMusic and Citytv, was honoured Dec. 4 when a part of Queen Street West in Toronto was renamed in his honour. The stretch of Queen, between John and Duncan streets, site of the iconic MuchMusic building, was dubbed Moses Znaimer Way in a ceremony sponsored by CTVGlobemedia and the city.

World

PARIS — French anthropologist Claude Levi-Strauss was honoured on his 100th birthday. In a Nov. 28 tribute, UNESCO head Koichiro Matsuura called Levi-Strauss "one of the greatest thinkers of the 20th century" who "changed our understanding of the world." Many publications and other events marked the centennial in France. Levi-Strauss was born into a Jewish family on Nov. 28, 1908. He fled France and spent World War II in New York. Among his best-known books are Structural Anthropology and The Savage Mind.

Carter Writes Book

ATLANTA — Jimmy Carter has written a new book about Mideast peace. The former U.S. president told his Atlanta-based Carter Center that We Can Bring Peace to the Holy Land will come out after president-elect Barack Obama takes office next month. Carter otherwise wouldn't discuss the book. He spoke of Israel's "persecution of the Palestinians" while on a panel last week that concluded a two-day seminar at the Carter Center on human rights. His controversial 2006 book, Palestine: Peace not Apartheid, likened Israeli settlement policies to apartheid and accused pro-Israel groups of muzzling debate in the United States.

Harper Honoured For Pro-Israel Stance

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Stephen Harper was honoured last week by a leading Jewish umbrella group for his government's support of Israel.

The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations gave Harper its inaugural International Leadership Award. Thornhill MP Peter Kent, minister of state of foreign affairs (Americas), accepted the award for Harper on Dec. 3 in New York.

The group said it was expressing appreciation for Canada's "courageous stands" on next year's so-called Durban II anti-racism conference, which Canada became the first nation to boycott earlier this year.

It also lauded Canada's "support for Israel and [its] efforts at the United Nations against incitement and... delegitimization, where [it has] taken a role in the forefront," said Malcolm Hoenlein, the group's executive vice-chairman. However, a published report said this year marks the first since Harper became prime minister in 2006 that Canada "has not incrementally shifted" its UN votes toward Israel on Mideast issues.

Anti-Israel Carolling

LONDON — An Anglican church in London hosted an evening of anti-Israel Christmas carols on Nov. 26. The "Bethlehem Now: Nine Alternative Lessons and Carols for Palestine" event, sponsored by a group called Jews for Boycotting Israeli Goods & Open Bethlehem, took place at St. James Church in London's West End. Funds raised, at $15 per ticket, went to Bethlehem charities. After complaints from the current and past Archbishop of Canterbury, and Jewish groups, the church's rector said he'd "think twice" before hosting a similar event in the future.

Indian, Jewish groups honour Mumbai dead

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Indo-Canadian and Jewish communities, as well as about 70 multifaith and multi-ethnic groups, gathered Sunday for a memorial service in honour of the victims of the Nov. 26 terror attacks in Mumbai.

The rally, which attracted a capacity crowd in the large hall at the International Centre in Mississauga, was organized by the Canada India Foundation and the Indo-Canada Chamber of Commerce, with the support of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy and Canadian Jewish Congress.

It began with the singing of the Indian and Canadian national anthems, and went on to feature seven children who each recited a short poem about peace.

"Peace is quite calm and happy. If we had an election, we should all vote for peace," said one.

Another said that we need to live in a place where all people live with respect and tolerance. "My dream includes people from all religions learning from each other. How wonderful if we could work together."

One boy said he was appearing on behalf of all children. "I urge the adults to unite [in order] to make the world a better place."

After a non-denominational prayer and a moment of silence, a video presentation highlighted worldwide terrorist attacks, beginning with 9/11 and moving on to attacks in Israel, and those in London, England, Bali and Madrid.

As well, speaker after speaker stood up to condemn the attacks.

Israel Consul General Amir Gissin said that our changing world now has two coalitions, the coalition of the extreme and the coalition of the moderates. "It is not a religious question, but a political question. The coalition of the victims of terror has a long way to go until it is united and strong."

Keynote speaker Ujjal Dosanjh, MP and former premier of British Columbia, said that terror has no country, no nationality or no religion. "Terrorism and violence are absolutely unacceptable as a way of resolving issues."

Jews, Hindus show solidarity with Mumbai victims

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jewish and Hindu groups gathered at the Israeli consulate last week in a show of solidarity with the victims of the Mumbai terrorist attacks.

About 25 to 30 people braved cold and bitter winds as speakers from both communities paid tribute to those killed by Islamic extremists.

Innocent victims were murdered "in the name of a vicious ideology," said Ron Banerjee, director of public relations for Canadian Hindu Advocacy (CHA).

They were victimized twice, Banerjee said – once by the terrorists themselves and then by the media, which suggested the killings were the result of oppression or marginalization felt by the perpetrators.

"The implication that they have some legitimate grievances is completely unacceptable," he told The CJN.

In an interview after the event, which saw participants march along Bloor Street from the Israeli consulate to the Indian consulate, Banerjee said many Hindus "consider the State of Israel as our ideal. We would like India to be more like Israel. We admire the heroism of Israel and the Jewish people – a tough yet compassionate approach to minority rights and security considerations. It is a model to the world, especially India."

India's BJP party, which is currently out of power but could win the next election in May, shares that attitude, he said.

In other remarks, Shirley Ann Haber of the Speakers Action Group, remembered the mostly Hindu victims of the terrorists "and for them, we mourn the senseless killing of innocents. As well, in a country where there has been traditionally no anti-Semitism, the Jews were targeted – this was evident in the Chabad Center, the Jewish Learning and Study Community Center, where the young Rabbi Holtzberg and his young wife, six months pregnant, were murdered with the other visitors."

Haber said the terrorists hoped to instil fear, deter tourism and destroy commercial relations. "But crucial is the hate – the hate of western society, the hate of the United States, the hate of the Jews, the hate of the Israelis."

The rally was sponsored by Speakers Action Group, a charitable organization that promotes "tolerance and understanding through cross-cultural education," the CHA, which represents hundreds of Hindus across Canada, and the Toronto Zionist Council.

The CHA's website states that the organization supports "multi-faith initiatives with groups and people who share our values of democracy, liberty, and merit-based success."

The Speakers Action Group and the CHA have collaborated on programs before. In February, the two sponsored "an interfaith evening to promote understanding by exploring our common history and build bridges between the Jewish and the Hindu community in Toronto," Haber said.

An attack on us all

Our hearts go out to all those murdered by terrorists in Mumbai, India. Almost 200 innocent people were killed by Islamic fanatics, and it should come as no surprise that Jews were among those the terrorists sought out. Six people, including Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg and his pregnant wife, Rivkah, were gunned down in Chabad's Nariman House. The couples two-year-old son, Moshe, escaped thanks only to their Indian nanny, Sandra Samuels, who grabbed him and bolted from the building.

In a city of 18 million, Jews number some 5,000. Nariman House is reportedly a non-descript building with no visible markings to suggest it was inhabited by Jews, and the surviving terrorist told Indian police that the facility was scouted well in advance. Jews have lived peacefully in Mumbai for hundreds of years, perhaps more. This was the community's first anti-Semitic attack. To find Jews, the terrorists went looking for them, not, as some commentators have suggested, because of a dispute over Kashmir, or anger over India's treatment of Muslims or even anger over the dispute with Israel. If you think that, then welcome to the fevered worldview of the Islamic terrorist, where slaughtering any Jew, or any westerner or any Hindu is as good as murdering another. For the terrorists, the people in Nariman House were legitimate targets simply because they were Jews.

A few years ago, a CJN reporter had the good fortune to travel to Russia as a guest of the Chabad Lubavitch movement. The Orthodox Jewish organization wanted to show off its good works in rekindling Jewish life in Russia after 70 years of Communism, and it invited a group of North American Jewish journalists to come see for themselves. In the city of Kazan, about 400 kilometres east of Moscow, the CJN reporter and an American colleague were guests of a young Chabad couple. Both Israelis, they had been dispatched to Kazan by senior rabbis to bring a little "Yiddishkeit," Jewish life, back to the city's Jews. With barely a second thought, they gracefully accepted their marching orders and transplanted their young family to the remote location.

For this CJN reporter, memories of spending Shabbat with the family and a handful of local Jews, with many young children scurrying about, came rushing back when the attack on the Chabad centre was reported. Rabbi Holtzberg and his wife also volunteered for a life far from home, and we can imagine them to be like the couple in Kazan – warm, welcoming and non-judgmental, especially since so few locals choose to live the same lifestyle as they do. Chabad has created a far-flung network of families such as those in Kazan and Mumbai, staffed by dedicated young people eager to bring the joys of their religious tradition to lapsed Jews and Jewish travellers far from home. Jews of all backgrounds – whether observant or not – should consider that it could have been them in the Chabad centre that day. The attack on Nariman House was an attack on us all.

Mumbai deaths of rabbi, rebbetzin

I want to express my deepest sympathies on the tragic murders of Rabbi Gavriel and Rivkah Holtzberg, among all those who lost their lives in the tragedy in Mumbai ("Chabad rabbi, wife slain," CJN, Dec. 4). As Jews, we feel pain at the tragic murder of Jews, whomever and wherever they may be. But, in addition, we feel the pain more acutely when we have been personally touched by those affected by the tragedy.

And in this, what Jew has not been affected by the warmth and love of Chabad rabbis and rebbetzins the world over? Thousands of Chabad rabbis have chosen to serve the Jewish people, to bring some Torah, some kosher food, some Shabbat spirit and some kindness to their fellow Jews, wherever they may be. And where may those fellow Jews be? Well, we are all over the world. And so that is where young Chabad families go. Young Israelis travel in very large numbers to India, so that is where Chabad rabbis will be found. Chabad offers travellers a Shabbat dinner, information on kosher food and a place to put on tfillin, as well as a friendly face.

The altruism and the self-sacrifice of these thousands of young couples is, to my simple mind, the highest of the heavens. I truly feel that this is the holy of the holiest. Personal comforts and the comforts of familiar surroundings are sacrificed – for us. The warmth of community of like-minded people, schools for the children are sacrificed – for us. The young couples of Chabad live lives of complete mesiras nefesh – complete self-sacrifice – to bring holiness and Torah to their fellow Jews. And all with a smile.

We have all, the entire Jewish people, been personally touched by Chabad shluchim, the women and men of Chabad. And our pain is more acute because of it. May the holy neshamahs of Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg and Rebbetzin Rivkah Holtzberg receive the splendour of the Shchinah that they deserve, having made the ultimate sacrifice.

From the depths of a pained heart,
Rabbi Reuven Tradburks

Diversity of Holocaust Education Week

Jonathan Usher ("Universalize Holocaust Education Week," CJN letters, Nov. 20) made the important point that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Holocaust Education Week must reach out to a wide community. However, his characterization of Holocaust Education Week as an event "presented by Jews, about and for Jews" couldn't be further from the truth. Clearly, he neglected to review our booklet or website www.holocausteducationweek.com, which reveals that as the largest Holocaust education event in the world, the programming teaches the lessons of genocide from a diversity of perspectives and voices.

Central to the UJA Holocaust Centre of Toronto's mandate with Holocaust Education Week is the teaching about contemporary manifestations of persecution and genocide. A few examples of this year's programming that address issues such as Darfur, Aboriginal Canadians, Armenian genocide and hate speech include: "Justice, Responsibility and Forgiveness: Legacies of the Holocaust and the Persecution of Aboriginal Canadians"; "From the Holocaust to Darfur: Lessons in Humanity for Today"; "From Hate to Hope: A Hate Crime Perpetrator and His Victim Come Together"; "Democide: Mass Murder in the 20th Century and Beyond"; "Hate Speech versus Free Speech"; "Rescuers in the Armenian Genocide and the Holocaust," to name just a few.

Our outreach activities have benefited immensely from the participation of the Christian-Jewish Dialogue, which organized programs in churches across Toronto, and the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario, who have worked co-operatively with churches, universities and multicultural organizations to promote their programs across Ontario.

With more than 25,000 individuals engaging with this year's programming, and 8,500 students, Holocaust Education Week continues to embrace inclusiveness and diversity in our broader mandate of teaching about, and learning from, the Holocaust.

Spelling error or Freudian slip?

Regarding your editorial "A different Arab offensive" (CJN, Nov. 27), perhaps there was no need to indicate a spelling error in the sub-headline of the advertisement that recently appeared in Israeli English language newspapers: "57 Arab and Muslim Countries will Establish Full Diplomatic and Normal Relations with Israel in Return for Comprehensive Pease [sic] Agreement and Ending the Occupation." The only spelling error in that sub-headline is the error of the omission. Add the missing prefix and suffix to the questionable spelling of "pease" and you get the "intended" word: appeasement.

Perspectives

Were the Mumbai attacks a harbinger?

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Israel may consider beefing up security at hundreds of Israeli and Jewish institutions around the world in the wake of the terrorist attack at the Chabad center in Mumbai, experts say.

The attacks on 10 sites in the Indian city, which killed nearly 200 people, could lead to a shift in the way Israel views global terrorism and the way to combat it. Six Jews, including five Israelis, were among the victims.

Besides tightening security around the institutions – Israeli representatives and businesspeople abroad may be advised to concentrate their offices in a single, well-protected compound – experts say there will have to be more training of counterterrorism forces, restructuring of intelligence gathering and enhanced global co-operation in training special forces and sharing intelligence.

The Indian special forces who responded to the Mumbai attacks were criticized as being slow to respond, inadequately prepared for such an attack and lacking key equipment.

Israeli experts long have predicted a mega-terror attack involving local, western and Israeli targets, including symbols of government and economic power. Experts believe Mumbai will become the new model for international terrorist networks such as Global Jihad or Al Qaeda.

As the Mumbai case showed, even in cases in which Israel ostensibly is not the focus of the conflict or attack, Israeli and Jewish institutions are likely to be targeted.

The lone surviving Mumbai terrorist, 21-year-old Azam Amir Kasab, reportedly told investigators that he and his comrades were given specific instructions to kill Israelis.

Weeks before the attack, reports said, members of the terrorist squad spent time at the Chabad center to gather intelligence. If true, this shows that the attack on Israelis and Jews was part of the overall planning of a highly sophisticated, multi-target operation.

It has enormous implications for security at Israeli and Jewish institutions worldwide, but equally so for intelligence gathering.

At the behest of then-prime minister Ariel Sharon, the former head of the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee, Dan Meridor, produced a classified report in 2006 on Israel's defence and intelligence needs in an age of potential high-tech megaterror. His recommendations, which remain secret, apparently were largely ignored. Mossad chief Meir Dagan preferred to focus the agency's intelligence-gathering effort almost exclusively on Iran's nuclear program.

Counterterrorism experts now are calling for revising this approach.

The attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and the bombings in subsequent years in Bali, London and Madrid all involved the Global Jihad's modus operandi of hitting several targets simultaneously.

Israeli experts see even greater sophistication in the Mumbai attacks. More targets were involved, the targets were selected carefully to shut down a big city and the nature of the attack required a huge military effort to bring it to an end. The possibility of Hezbollah, Hamas or Global Jihad attempting something similar in Israel is a worst-case scenario that Israeli security specialists must consider.

What was new about Mumbai was the sheer size of the targets taken over by the terrorists. Indeed, the Mumbai attacks may serve as a game-changer in the way counterterrorist forces prepare for attacks.

Going room to room and floor to floor in a multi-storey, modern building to flush out terrorists who could be anywhere and to save hostages requires highly co-ordinated action by much larger special forces than currently exist in Israel – or for that matter, anywhere else. For Israel, it means training more special forces at home and possibly helping train others abroad. It also means heightened surveillance at potential target sites to spot suspicious people, guests or customers trying to gather intelligence and prepare for an attack.

Israeli experts note that the attackers in Mumbai were highly skilled in the use of weapons and explosives, had detailed intelligence on their targets and used sophisticated navigation devices. In other words, they performed like soldiers in a regular army.

Like soldiers, they likely spent time at terrorist camps undergoing training. An effective pre-emptive counterterrorist measure could be to hit terrorist training camps in places such as Lebanon or Pakistan, Israeli experts say.

While acknowledging the difficulty of fighting terrorists at as many as 10 sites, Israeli experts have been very critical of the way Indian security and special forces operated.

They point to three stages of failure: the lack of any prior intelligence on the planned terrorist operation, the failure to intercept the terrorists as they infiltrated the Indian coast and the slowness of the counterterrorism operation on the ground.

The experts were particularly critical of the drawn-out operation at Nariman House, the building that houses the Chabad centre. Unlike the large hotels, the experts say, there was no reason to take 12 hours to liberate the much smaller Chabad house. For the hostages to have had any chance of survival, the counterterrorist operation needed to take place in minutes, not hours.

Others in Israel slammed the critics, noting that Israel, with its long history of fighting terrorism, has had its fair share of failures, too.

For its part, the Israeli government has studiously avoided any official criticism of the Indian effort. Diplomats, fearing possible strains in the close ties between Israel and India, urged Israeli critics to tread more carefully.

Israeli-Indian military, intelligence and counterterrorism co-operation is extremely close. Over the past several years, India has purchased an estimated $8 billion worth of military equipment from Israel, including the Green Pines radar system employed by Israel's Arrow anti-ballistic missile batteries. India's defence-related purchases from Israel amount to some $1.5 billion annually.

Just three weeks ago, Indian Defence Secretary Vijay Singh visited Israel to discuss the purchase of state-of-the-art Phalcon early-warning planes, missiles, helicopters and maintenance equipment for unmanned aircraft. The visit also focused on counterterrorism, with high-level intelligence exchanges on the war against global terrorism.

After Mumbai, the already deep co-operation between the two countries on counterterrorism almost certainly will be enhanced. India will want to share Israeli expertise, and Israel will be desperately keen to provide it. Both sides recognize that fighting global terrorism will take a huge, international collaborative effort.

Lighting up the darkness

It's so dark. I wake up in darkness and leave work in the dark. I hate it! I've learned to live with the cold and the snow. But the darkness is too much. It pours gloominess into our souls.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Remember the sun. Walking home at 7 p.m. meant there was a longer day, you could get more things done and everyone was smiling. (I know that wasn't really true, but it felt that way.)

So how do we cope with this reversal, this ever-present, disheartening night?

We light candles!

Right at the lowest point of our doldrums, when the days are at their shortest, we spend some time counting eight days and lighting numerous (44) candles in celebration of some long ago "minor" holiday.

It should come as no surprise that we have a holiday of lights that comes to cheer us up in winter. Somewhere in December, we Jews are lucky/smart enough to have the holiday of Chanukah, which emphasizes light and fire.

The original storyline focused on the survival of the few against the many (see the prayer Al Hanissim). Theologians and historians concentrated on the fight for religious freedom. But folk literature emphasized the "miracle of the lights." One little bit of oil, enough only for one day, lasted eight days until new purified oil could be brought to the Temple.

Clearly, in the grand scheme of things, the victory was of the few over the many, of a non-military force over a grand army, and about the Jews' ability to survive against religious intolerance and to reclaim their Temple, re-purify it and reignite the worship of God there. The burning of oil is only a minor story within the story. Perhaps it was emblematic, but whatever its original place, it has gained significance with time and climate. That original lighting of oil and our repeat performance has tremendous power to lighten our burden and bring smiles to our faces.

"One for each night, they shed their sweet light that remind us of times long ago." The flames have the power to bring light and gladness, memory and sweetness.

Chanukah isn't just a children's gift holiday. It's a mid-winter solstice holiday that cheers us up. It brings light into the darkness of our winter, shines a glowing torch at us and warms our spirits. We should be mindful of our ancestors' battle for freedom of religion. It seems that in every generation, we've had to fight that fight, with Chanukah registering the first battle. And our survival is indeed a miracle worthy of celebration.

But this holiday allows us to add a fire ritual that seems crucial, for it enables us to light up the darkness. In the winter, it's truly necessary.

May words lead us to the messianic era

The horrific slaughter in Mumbai is difficult to comprehend. The random viciousness of the attackers – who seem to have been very young men – leaves us wondering how minds can be twisted to justify the wanton murder of men, women and children without regard to the sanctity of human life.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

In our yearly cycle of Torah readings, we have begun reading the saga of Jacob and his family. In Toldot, the parshah we read on the Shabbat following the massacres, enmity between Jacob and Esau begins with Jacob's deception, Esau's anger and Isaac's bewilderment: "The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau."

Midrash Rabba 21:1 states: "Isaac left his two sons two legacies. To Jacob, he left the voice, for so it says 'The voice is the voice of Jacob,' but to Esau he bequeathed the hands, as it says, 'but the hands are the hands of Esau.'

"Esau was very proud of his legacy. As it says, 'And Edom said to him: Thou shalt not pass through me, lest I come out with the sword against you;' Jacob, too, was proud of his legacy, for it says, 'And we cried unto the Lord, the God of our fathers, and the Lord heard our voice.'"

The midrash goes on to argue that, in effect, these are two legacies that will persist: in the messianic era, Esau will be punished with the sword, Jacob will be rewarded with words – a voice raised in celebration.

Now we know that things are not so simple. Words can destroy and devastate as well as build and create, and the sword – military effectiveness – is needed to protect against enemies that would attack.

We still don't know, as of this writing, what the motivating factor was behind the Mumbai carnage. Were the attackers Islamist terrorists looking simply to spread panic? Did they single out the Chabad rabbi and his wife with particular animus? Did they seek to restore the atmosphere of hostility between Pakistan and India, derailing any hope of detente and progress toward some harmony?

Were they like the suicide bombers and enemies of peace who fire up their weapons whenever there is a glimmer of hope for a settlement between Palestinians and Israelis?

One can see from the daily news that a serpent of hatred has coiled around the hearts of Islamists. There have been horrible attacks in India for several years, and the minions of Al Qaeda lurk in the mountains of Pakistan, attacking soldiers and civilians alike, without regard for life. Hearing the news of 9/11, people danced in the streets, celebrating death and the sword. (Then they blamed the Jews.)

This cult of violence has spread beyond enmity toward our people to engulf others who are innocent of any crimes.

Yet where are the voices?

When will the world realize that violence against one group will inevitably engulf all? When will the world realize that it's not "the West," Israel or any one group, but humanity that will pay the price for this cult of violence and death?

I want to hear, loud and clear, the voices of every imam, minister and rabbi raised against continuing this cycle of vengeance. I want to hear from every mosque, from every pulpit, from the Vatican denunciation of these crimes – not hand-wringing, but a call to reject those who take up the sword. I want to hear in those voices revulsion at these acts and against those who perpetrate them.

I want to hear that mothers teach their sons – and daughters – that the sword is not the path to glory and paradise, but a hollow weapon that leads all of us toward mutual destruction.

When our rabbi concluded his teaching on this midrash, he shifted the argument away from the two brothers (and their descendants) to address the current violence. The reward for the entire world will be, he taught, when words, not weapons, are used to settle conflict.

We pray that comfort and a healing message will go out to the thousands of people affected by this latest attack, and that words, not weapons, will lead us toward that messianic era, when there will be no need for the sword of Esau.

Holocaust awareness in Canada

The Holocaust was a blight on the history of humanity. Millions of lives were destroyed while the world stood by and permitted this tragedy of unprecedented proportions to take place. The Holocaust became a fundamental element of the Jewish experience.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Considering the enormity of the Holocaust, how aware are Canadians of it? A recent poll of 1,500 Canadians, conducted by Leger Marketing under the auspices of the Association for Canadian Studies, sought to answer that question.

The poll revealed that a significant number of young people in Canada have little or no awareness of the Holocaust. Seven per cent of Canadians have never heard of the Holocaust and 13 per cent (one out of eight) between the ages of 18 and 24 have never heard of it.

Just under one-third of all Canadians reported that they do not have a good knowledge of the Holocaust.

How do people learn about the Holocaust? The survey disclosed that 36 per cent stated that they had read about the Holocaust in a book. Indeed, there have been many books written on the topic, including The Holocaust By Bullets: A Priest's Journey to Uncover the Truth behind the Murder of 1.5 Million Jews, by Father Patrick Desbois. It was recently the subject of a segment on CBC Radio One's Sunday Morning.

Fifty-one per cent of those surveyed stated that they had read an article about the Holocaust in a newspaper, while 13 per cent indicated that they had visited museum exhibits about the Holocaust. In fact, while visiting Auschwitz last March, I was impressed to see that students and teachers from two Canadian schools (from Corner Brook, Nfld., and from Brooks, Alta.) were also there.

Most remarkably, 56 per cent of those surveyed had learned about the Holocaust through films. The New York Times recently published a feature in its Sunday Arts and Leisure section, by A.O. Scott, titled Never Forget. You're Reminded. The article discussed the new films focusing on the Holocaust, including The Boy in the Striped Pajamas, Adam Resurrected and The Reader, and asks why there are so many Holocaust films. Given that more than half of Canadians learn details of the Holocaust through films, it is important that each new generation be exposed through this medium. The previous generation got their information from Schindler's List, and young people today are also being taught about the Holocaust through movies.

The survey reveals that with greater formal education comes a greater knowledge of the Holocaust. This underscores the importance of including the Holocaust as a mandatory component of social studies curricula throughout Canada. In fact, the Holocaust is currently an integral element of many provincial curricula. This was outlined in a recent report published by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada called Holocaust Education in Canada: A Review and Analysis of Curriculum, Policies, Programs and Teacher Training.

We have vowed and the world has pledged never to forget, never to allow humanity's dark penchant for inhumanity to stoop to such depths and depravity. Yet, the world has allowed repeated instances of genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity. We have witnessed this recently in Somalia, in the Sudan, in Rwanda, in the Balkans and elsewhere.

On Dec. 10, the world marked the 60th anniversary of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights. When the UN General Assembly adopted this resolution in 1948, it was a direct response to the horrors of the Holocaust and represented a worldwide initiative to ensure that a holocaust never occurs again. As the world has since seen, the values and principles of the Universal Declaration have still to be realized on a global scale.

The lessons of the Holocaust, the sanctity of the memory of those who perished will only survive if the history of the Holocaust is continually learned and the message of the tragedy is continually etched into the conscience and consciousness of all future generations.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

As the eighth year of the new millennium ends, readers may want to dip into the latest selection of books hot off the press.

Uri Savir knows a thing or two about peace. As director general of Israel's foreign ministry from 1993 to 1996, he played a pivotal role in talks with the Palestinians during the Oslo era. Later, he was a founder of the Peres Center for Peace. Savir's newest book, Peace First (Berrett-Koehler), draws on his experiences from Oslo and argues that enduring peace is built from the bottom up, not from the top down. His observations on the collapse of the Oslo process are particularly instructive. It failed for a number of reasons, he writes. Oslo dwelled on the past and did not reach for historical reconciliation. It did not create the motivation to sustain peace. It did not promote a culture of peace, nor did it emphasize economic co-operation to create common interests. Lastly, it did not promote peace socially and politically. Yet Oslo was not a complete bust, Savir believes. Without the Oslo agreements, Israel would have annexed the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, resulting in total turmoil, anarchy and a binational state.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Neve Gordon's Israel's Occupation (University of California Press) examines the history of Israel's presence in the territories since the Six Day War. In a rigorous analysis, Gordon, a lecturer in politics and government at Ben-Gurion University, shows how the occupation has changed structurally over the years. King Hussein ruled Jordan, Israel's neighbour, until his death in 1999. Nigel Ashton's comprehensive biography, King Hussein of Jordan (Yale University Press), draws on the kings's private papers, including his correspondence with Israeli, American and British leaders. In Beyond Terror and Martyrdom (Harvard University Press), Gilles Kepel, a professor of Middle East history at the Institute of Political Studies in Paris, argues that the United States' war on terror is misplaced and should be replaced by a constructive dialogue between Islam and the West. The State of the Middle East: An Atlas of Conflict and Resolution (University of California Press), by Dan Smith, is a concise primer on historical developments in the region, encompassing Arab nationalism, Zionism, European colonialism, oil, water resources, military spending, education and human rights. A companion volume, Canadian Oxford World Atlas (Oxford University Press), is bright and clear. Rekindling the Torch: The Story of Canadian Zionism (Key Porter), by David Azrieli and Joe King, is extensively researched and abundantly illustrated.

Mark Cohen's Under Crescent & Cross: The Jews in the Middle Ages (Princeton University Press) explains in systematic fashion why Jewish-Muslim relations were less confrontational than those between Jews and Christians in the West. Reuven Firestone's An Introduction to Islam for Jews (Jewish Publication Society) is timely and appropriate. Two Nations in Your Womb: Perceptions of Jews and Christians in Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages, by Hebrew University scholar Israel Yuval, discusses such prime issues as the source of Jewish-Christian hostility and ritual murder accusations.

The Soviet Jewry movement is the subject of Philip Spiegel's Triumph Over Tyranny (Devora), which touches on topics from human rights campaigns to Israel's covert missions to facilitate Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union. A passage from Emil Draitser's Shush! A Memoir of Growing up Jewish Under Stalin (University of California Press) sums it up: "I simply couldn't recall a single moment in my life when the shame [of being Jewish] wasn't an intimate part of my existence." In Hope Not Fear: A Path to Jewish Renaissance (St. Martin's Press), the former president of the World Jewish Congress, Edgar Bronfman, outlines a new agenda for the North American Jewish community that, he claims, will ensure continuity in an open society. Read it in conjunction with Rabbi David Wolpe's Why Faith Matters (HarperCollins), a long essay on faith in the modern world.

Joel Kraemer's Maimonides: The Life and World of One of Civilization's Greatest Minds (Doubleday) is sweeping in scope and accessible. Ehrhard Bahr's Weimar on the Pacific: German Exile Culture in Los Angeles and the Crisis of Modernism (University of California Press) unfolds through the lives of Jewish refugees from Nazism such as Theodor Adorno, Franz Werfel and Alfred Doblin. The second edition of Elisabeth Young-Bruehl's biography of child analyst Anna Freud, Anna Freud (Yale University Press), contains a new appendix article and an updated bibliography.

Philip Davis' biography of a renowned American novelist/short story writer, Bernard Malamud (Oxford University Press), is definitely definitive. Hana Wirth-Nesher's Call it English: The Languages of Jewish-American Literature (Princeton University) traces the trajectory of distinctive voices, drawing on authors like Malamud, Henry Roth, Cynthia Ozick and Abraham Cahan. Rose Keefe's The Starker (Cumerland House) is a sociological blast from New York City's criminal past. It is a biography of gangster Zelig Zvi Lefkowitz (Big Jack Zelig), who ruthlessly ran the Lower East Side from 1910 to 1912.

Yiddish in America (University of Chicago Press), edited by Edward Shapiro, consists of illuminating essays on topics ranging from drama and poetry to cinema and music. In Yiddish Lands (Wayne State University Press), scholar David Roskies, an ex-Montrealer, looks back on his life through the medium of Yiddish culture.

Barbara Epstein's The Minsk Ghetto 1941-1943: Jewish Resistance and Soviet Internationalism (University of California Press) recounts a little-known but heroic chapter of the Shoah. The Terezin Album of Marianka Zadikow (University of Chicago Press) is something of a keepsake from the Holocaust – a collection of signatures, sketches and inscriptions, as compiled by an imprisoned bookbinder, from the Theresienstadt concentration camp. In Among the Righteous (Public Affairs), Robert Satloff tells the little known story of Arabs who helped North African Jews during the Holocaust.

In general: Nobel: A Century of Prize Winners (Firefly Books), edited by Michael Worek, singles out some 200 laureates, including Albert Einstein, Milton Friedman and Menachem Begin. Firefly's World of Facts (Firefly Books), by Russell Ash, is endlessly fascinating. Christopher Shulgan's The Soviet Ambassador: The Making of the Radical Behind Perestroika (McClelland & Stewart) turns on Aleksandr Yakovlev, the Soviet functionary and diplomat who became a force for democracy in the Soviet Union. The First Day of the Blitz (Yale University Press), by Peter Stansky, recalls the day and the year, Sept. 7, 1941, when Germany's long-feared bombardment of London occurred.

My daughter the author

In keeping with the tenets of an impartial book reviewer, I try to be objective and distanced. But when I Live Here (Pantheon) reached my desk, all notions of objectivity flew out the window, because the lead author is my beloved and talented older daughter, Mia, who has earned a living until now as an actress. I Live Here, a harrowing, poetic and beautifully packaged account of refugees and displaced people in four corners of the world, is truly a labour of love. Mia took personal and financial risks to make it happen, and now, finally, I Live Here is a reality of which she can be proud. As a father, I congratulate her and send her hugs and kisses.

Israel must embrace Judaism to survive, Nobel laureate says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Nobel Prize laureate Robert Aumann warned last week that Jews in Israel may not survive as a nation unless they embrace Jewish values.

Speaking at an Aish Toronto seminar at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation on the topic of Israel's future, Aumann, a Hebrew University mathematician and game theorist, said, "If we want to survive as a nation in Israel, we have to go back to Jewish values."

Aumann, who is Orthodox, added: "There's no other way. It's got to go that way."

Aumann, who shared the 2005 Nobel Prize in economics with Thomas Schelling, expressed certainty that the Jewish People will endure. But in a reference to Israel, which marked its 60th anniversary last spring, he said, "I have my doubts about the 60-year-old entity."

Suggesting that Israel can be saved by a massive infusion of Jewish values, Aumann warned the country could be "finished" if it continues to be underpinned by western values.

As he put it, "Mozart won't save us."

Aumann, a 78-year-old German-born yeshiva graduate who earned a PhD in the United States, said Israel was largely founded by secular Jews imbued with a love for Zion and Jewish values. But he voiced regret that they have not succeeded in passing on these ideas to their children and grandchildren.

Claiming that Israel's secular elite has lost its raison d'etre, he said its members have forgotten that Israel's history goes back 3,600 years. Suggesting they are not proper custodians of the Zionist dream, he said, "And so the whole thing comes apart in their hands."

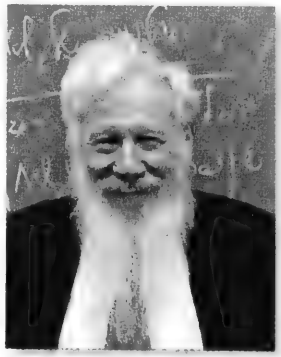
In a survey blending history and religion, Aumann said, "The state of our future is in the past. Israel is not 60. Israel is 60 times 60, or 3,600 years old. That's when Israel was born."

In a reference to the territories captured by Israel in the Six Day War, Aumann said that too few Israelis regard these places as holy. "We don't have any red lines," he declared.

"And if we continue this way, we'll be left with nothing," he added, referring to previous Israeli withdrawals from Gaza and the West Bank.

Urging perseverance in the face of Arab hostility, he called on Israelis to "keep up the struggle."

Blasting Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in 2005, Aumann said it marked the first time that "a people have expelled themselves."



Robert Aumann

Fearing that Israel may give up still more settlements in the territories, he said, "The Israeli government should not repeat that crime against humanity."

Aumann said neither Jews nor Arabs should be expelled from their homes. "We have to find a way to live with our cousins," he said of the Palestinians.

Disagreeing with the argument that anti-Zionism is synonymous with anti-Semitism, Aumann said, "There are plenty of Jews who are anti-Zionists, who don't want a Jewish state in Israel."

No logical relationship exists between anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism, he observed. "But in practice, the two get all mixed up," he added, alluding to the Muslim terrorists who murdered Jews earlier this month in Mumbai.

Retired Israeli ambassador mistrusts Obama

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

People should should be skeptical of U.S. president-elect Barack Obama's position on the Israel-Palestinian conflict, Yoram Ettinger, a retired Israeli ambassador to Washington, said in Toronto late last month.

Ettinger, who writes a hawkish online newsletter, the Ettinger Report, works as a consultant on U.S.-Israel bilateral relations with both American legislators and Israeli members of Knesset.

Speaking to an audience of more than 40 people at the downtown offices of law firm Cassels and Brock on Nov. 26, Ettinger warned that Obama is a neophyte when it comes to the Middle East.

"Obama lacks any experience in foreign policy," he said, adding that the president-elect's worldview "is reflected in his advisers, [who are] being drawn from the Carter and Clinton administrations."

Ettinger, who was in Toronto as part of a speaking tour, warned that many of those advisers played key roles in previous U.S. administrations' "complacency in the face of global, rising Islamism."

Last week, Obama selected Susan Rice – a staff member of U.S. president Bill Clinton's National Security Council in the early 1990s, as well as Obama's foreign policy adviser during the election campaign – as ambassador to the United Nations. He also made Senator Hillary Clinton his secretary of state.

Terrorists used to think of former president Clinton as "a paper tiger," and the same thing may happen to Obama, Ettinger said.

He said that based on his talks with U.S. political insiders, Obama and his advisers believe that "the UN should play a high role" in Mideast peace talks.

"Obama and his advisers are among those who consider terrorism to be a law enforcement problem, not to be tackled unilaterally, but preferably, multilaterally," Ettinger said, before adding that this doesn't "bode well" for Israel in its fight against Palestinian terrorism.

"How long would a NATO force sustain itself after it lost scores of forces to improvised explosive devices in Judea and Samaria?" Ettinger asked. "Anyone suggesting that Israel has to give up Jewish geography to save Jewish demography is devastatingly wrong."

Despite his bleak outlook, Ettinger offered hope for continued U.S. support of Israel, saying Congress acts as a "check and balance" on the president.

"Congress does wield power, and Israel is supported by the American people [on the whole]," he said. "Most substance injected into U.S.-Israel relations since 1948 had its origins on Capitol Hill, and mostly in defiance of [presidents and their administrations], and even sometimes in defiance of Israeli administrations."

And just because Congress is controlled by Democrats doesn't mean a Democratic president will have a "free ride," Ettinger said.

"Obama will not have an automatic majority in the House or Senate, and certainly not on the matter of Israel" because every congressman or senator has to answer to his or her constituents.

There are "fundamental shared values" and a "fundamental affinity by Americans to the notion of a Jewish state," which is reflected in the allegiance of the majority of American legislators, Ettinger said.

Speaking to The CJN after his talk, Ettinger said he believes Canada and the United States can help transform Palestinian society from one of "corruption eroding it from within" to one based on western democratic ideals.

Ettinger advised Ottawa to send the following message to the Palestinian Authority: "No negotiation, no contact, until you eradicate completely… hate education. Only when you prove [to Canada]… after two or three years have gone by without any form of hate education – not in schools, media or mosques – only then will Canada resume relations.

"Anybody… that persists in negotiations with the PA while they conduct hate education is indirectly, and sometimes directly, abetting terrorism and distancing Israelis and Palestinians from peace. Because hate education is murder."

Ettinger's talk was co-sponsored by the Speakers Action Group and the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association.

Clarification

The story "Zareinu's miracles celebrated at fashion show" (CJN, Dec. 4) should have explained that Zareinu student Shayna Markin began walking with assistance at three years of age. Only recently, did she begin to walk independently and now makes her own way from the car into the school.

Correction

The article "Jewish Archives acquire rabbi's records" (CJN, Dec. 4), included incorrect information about a display on the fourth floor of the Lipa Green Building, which contains a case dedicated to Rabbi David Monson's stint as a Jewish army chaplain. It is a satellite display of the Canadian Jewish Military Museum and General Wingate Branch 256 of the Royal Canadian Legion. The CJN regrets the error.

Israelis respond to humanitarian crises

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

IsraAID founder Shachar Zahavi, who has been working with Israeli humanitarian aid organizations since he was moved by images from the 1994 Rwandan genocide, said that "seeing their faces" inspired him to help the needy.

"I was finishing the army and the genocide in Rwanda was on TV, and I decided that I really wanted to do something," said 32-year-old Zahavi, who was in Toronto earlier this year to meet with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto leaders and speak to students at York University about the work that the Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid (IsraAID) does.

"I hooked up with a couple of friends. We started fundraising and came up with a campaign to fundraise for a bag of rice for each child, and we were able to raise many tons of rice and that was my first relief mission. We sent food to the Congo where the refugees fled."

After getting a taste of helping those in need, he said he spent the following years taking care of the logistics for many disaster relief programs led by a variety of Israeli NGOs.

But Zahavi felt that Israeli NGOs could be more effective if they were willing to work together.

"I thought, 'Why don't we get all the groups to sit down together and work together to help each other in terms of fundraising, [public relations], co-ordinating?'"

Shachar Zahavi

In 2001, Zahavi founded IsraAID, a co-ordinating body of Israeli and Jewish NGOs, as well as other groups based in Israel, that are active in development and relief work.

It has an annual operating budget of about $100,000, and donations come from private sources and federations.

He said that when a community is in need of aid, the directors of member organizations, including Save a Child's Heart, F.I.R.S.T (Search & Rescue Teams), Jerusalem AIDS Project, the Israeli Friends of the Tibetan People and The Last Great Ape, gather to discuss what each organization can bring to the table in terms of expertise and fundraising capabilities.

"Each one benefits differently from our partnership, but I can say that everyone is in it for two reasons – really helping people in need and showing that Israel and the Jewish people have something to contribute to global issues," Zahavi said.

In May, IsraAID sent a small team of doctors, nurses and water specialists to the Delta region of Myanmar, formerly known as Burma, just four days after cyclone Nargis devastated the area, which killed some 130,000 people and left hundreds of thousands vulnerable to disease and starvation.

When tens of thousands of Georgians were displaced from their homes in South Ossetia after war broke out in August between Russian and Georgian forces, IsraAID established a project to provide hot meals to the refugees in and around Gori, the regional capital of central Georgia.

And most recently, IsraAID sent a team of post trauma experts to Mumbai following the terrorist attack that claimed the lives of more than 160 people to train locals how to support the victims of terror.

When the tsunami hit Sri Lanka in December 2004, IsraAID was one of the first organizations on the ground and within the first few weeks. " We were the only western NGO who met twice with the prime minister of Sri Lanka," Zahavi said.

"When something happens, we automatically commit, and I have to tell you that the Toronto federation – and I know a lot of federations – is one of the few that understands that."

He said that when IsraAID committed to go to Myanmar and to Georgia, he called UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's president and CEO Ted Sokolsky and within 24 hours, he approved the funding necessary to send a relief team to the affected regions.

"Ted really gets it," Zahavi said, adding that it's good to show the rest of the world that Israelis are among the first respondents.

Zahavi, who heads IsraAID on a volunteer basis and makes his living as an adviser on international aid issues and an assistant researcher on foreign aid at Tel Aviv University, said that helping the needy helps him put his own life in perspective.

"Most people that go to a developing country, some have mixed emotions, but I've never met someone who had the chance to go to a refugee camp after an emergency and wasn't hooked on humanitarian aid," he said.

"It is interesting to see [that] starving people or people who fled a war are more interested to see such a faraway country cares about them."

BBC's Mumbai coverage minimized Jewish angle

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

For three days in late November, the world watched as terrorists attacked hotels, restaurants and other public places in Mumbai, killing 173 civilians. At the city's Chabad House, six Jews, many of them Israeli, were murdered, including Rabbi Gavriel Noach Holtzberg, 29, and his 28-year-old pregnant wife, Rivkah.

While Americans and British citizens were also killed in the attacks, the Chabad House was the only site specifically singled out because of the religion and national affiliation of its residents. It was obvious to most media outlets that the Chabad House could only have been the target of careful pre-planning. That fact sent a chill through the 4,000-member Mumbai Jewish community, in addition to other Diaspora communities and Israel.

In "Mum On Mumbai" (National Post, Dec. 3), Tom Gross, a Mideast media analyst and former correspondent for Britain's Daily Telegraph, strongly criticized the BBC for minimizing its reporting on the attack on Chabad House, and for not using the term "terrorism."

Gross wrote: "For most of the Mumbai siege, the BBC went out of its way to avoid reporting that the Jewish community centre was one of the seven targets. At one point viewers were told that 'an office building' had been targeted (referring to the Jewish centre as such)."

He also criticized the New York Times for a Nov. 29 report that said: "It is not known if the Jewish centre was strategically chosen, or if it was an accidental hostage scene."

Gross noted that "Dozens of eyewitness accounts from local Indians said the gunmen shouted 'Allah Akbar' from the Jewish centre. The centre is housed in a non-descript block and is not obviously marked from the outside. It is the one Jewish building in a densely crowded city of millions. And the Times, the self-proclaimed paper of record, wants to let readers think it might have been an accidental target?"

In "Anxious Israelis await fate of hostages at Jewish centre," (Globe and Mail, Nov. 28), the Globe and Mail's Mideast correspondent, Patrick Martin, left no doubt that the Chabad House had been strategically chosen.

Martin interviewed Shabtai Shavit, the former head of Israel's foreign intelligence service, the Mossad, paraphrasing him: "Events in India should remind people, and especially Israelis, that there really is no safe place any more." Shavit added: "People thought India was the last frontier, that, even with a sizable Muslim minority, it would escape this era of terrorism without an incident of its own."

Toronto Star deputy foreign editor Martin Regg Cohn ("How to respond to terrorism," Dec. 2) placed Israel among the countries that must contend with terrorism, leaving the impression that other nations have learned how to cope with terrorism that has long affected Israel.

Cohn argued that terrorism, while psychologically traumatic, is not an existential threat to the countries that have suffered from it: "America is still standing after airplanes crashed into the Pentagon and the World Trade Center in 2001. India's democracy remains robust after the flagrant attacks on its Parliament buildings that same year. Israel is still strong after decades of terrorist assaults."

Cohn emphasized how resilient – and even defiant – people almost everywhere are in the face of terrorism. Recalling his own experience reporting from Israel, he noted: "Fortunately, the high death tolls almost never deter ordinary people from getting on with their lives. The best evidence for me was a brutal attack on Jerusalem's No. 18 bus that demoralized the Israeli capital in 1996, before suicide bombings had become commonplace. There were fears that people would avoid public transit. So the next morning, I hopped on the No. 18 bus to interview commuters and discovered they were loath to let the terrorists claim victory."

From "Jews of Mumbai, a Tiny and Eclectic Group, Suddenly Reconsider Their Serene Existence" (New York Times, Dec. 3):

"Today, most of Mumbai's Jews have roots in a group known as the Bene Israel community, which claims to be descended from seven Jewish families who were shipwrecked on India's shore while fleeing persecution in the Galilee during the second century BC. Over the centuries, they adopted Indian language, dress and cuisine. Since India became independent, these Jews have often played influential roles in Indian society, including in government and Bollywood."

U of T centre to build bridges in community

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Hindy Najman, the director of the newly established Centre for Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto, said she is committed to building bridges between Toronto's Jewish community and the university.

Although U of T has had a program for Jewish studies since 1967, it wasn't until the spring of this year that the Centre for Jewish Studies was created.

Najman, who is succeeding Derek Penslar, the Jewish studies director from 2003 to 2008 – during which time the program was elevated to the status of a centre – is an associate professor in the department of near and Middle Eastern civilization and the Centre for the Study of Religion.

"I have a very serious commitment as a faculty member of Jewish studies, as an associate professor of religion and ancient Judaism, as a member of [UJA] federation and as a member of the community of Toronto, to build a bridge between the Jewish community and the University of Toronto, and to let the Centre for Jewish Studies be that bridge," said Najman, who obtained her PhD from Harvard University.

She said that over the years, the Jewish studies program – which offers courses in archeology, art, history, languages, literature, performance, philosophy, political science, religion and sociology – has organized lecture series' to keep the Jewish community connected to Jewish academia, but she said she hopes to build on that.

Hindy Najman

"I've met with [Hillel of Greater Toronto executive director] Zac Kaye, and we're working together to do collaborative projects. The Hillel institution is very different from an academic centre for Jewish studies and the downtown JCC is also very different, but I understand that [the centre can] work with those two very well established and beautiful places."

Najman said she was very excited about the challenge of running a high- profile Jewish centre in Canada that focuses on modern Jewish life, culture and identity on one hand, and literacy and classical Judaism on the other.

"The Jewish studies faculty [at U of T] is one of the largest in North American and one of the most vibrant, but the various programs have not been, I would say, mobilized and become as high profile as they deserve and as they should be. Becoming a centre has enabled us to be more high profile and robust."

Within the past five years, the Jewish studies program has developed a doctoral program, and Najman said that she has gotten "a bright green light" from four U of T deans to establish a master's degree in Jewish studies.

"Right now, we work closely with history and religion and philosophy and English [departments], but there is interest right now in the Centre for Medieval Studies and classics [department] to build with us, as well," she said.

"We have about 2,000 undergraduates taking classes in Jewish studies, and right now, part of my job is to get the message out to students to let them know how it benefits them," she said.

She said one of her top priorities is to get endowments for the centre.

"I haven't brought in endowments yet, but people have responded by saying, 'We get it. This is fantastic, and we're going to help you, Hindy,'" she said.

"My job is to figure out how to build that bridge and how to secure endowments for the future of the study of Judaism for the University of Toronto in a way that it will be here in perpetuity, so that the programs for students is not at the whim of a department or financial strength."

Najman said she is encouraged by the response from members of the Jewish community, who have told her to "build more, build higher, and dream in Technicolour."

In an effort to make the centre more accessible to students, Najman said that U of T is committed to moving the centre from a small office on the third floor of University College to a more central area.

"I think one major concern that the Jewish community has is what to do with difficult moments for Jewish students on campus," she said referring to the rise of anti-Israel events on campus in recent years.

"My message has consistently been, we need to build a vibrant centre, which encompasses Israel studies, Israeli film, culture and art and North American Judaism. So when people ask, 'What is Israel? What is Judaism?' they get a full vibrant, robust picture."

Najman hopes that reaching outside of the academic circles will help create connections with the rest of the community.

"It's about bridge-building with federation, with the Koffler Centre of the Arts, with the ROM [Royal Ontario Museum] – the ROM isn't part of the Jewish community, but they will be housing the Dead Sea Scrolls," she said.

"I'm running, with two other colleagues, a Dead Sea Scrolls conference, which will in part be housed by the centre. It'll also be connected to McMaster University, and there will be international scholars."

The conference, scheduled for next year, will be a high-profile university event, but, she added, it will also be open to Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto students.

Najman is also working on a Jewish Philosophy Conference and a Culture and Life Conference, both set to take place in 2010.

"This is about strengthening the Greater Toronto Area and we're a leading light, the premier research institution in Canada, and my feeling is that we should enable other projects and programs from other institutions to work together."

Spry octogenarian walked 5 km to raise funds

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Miriam (Mary) Schlanger, 89, defies her chronological age.

She recently walked five kilometres in a charity fundraiser, she raises thousands of dollars for charities each year, helps the homeless, is actively involved in her synagogue and travels by public transit, and that's only the tip of the iceberg.

"I'll be 90 years old in May, but I don't feel 90," Schlanger said.

Her social activism comes from her experience living in Siberia during the 1940s.

"I remember being hungry in Siberia, and I want to cry when I see people standing in line for food or begging for money. I always carry spare change for the people on the street," Schlanger said.

The CJN interviewed her with her daughter, Soozi Schlanger, a musician and visual artist who said her mother is "intuitive and relentless," adding "she is the smallest lady with the biggest heart."

"Tzedakah is a way of life for me," Miriam Schlanger said. "This year I raised more than $11,000. I work for many charities, including [the] Canadian Breast Cancer [Foundation], Baycrest Foundation, Masada chapter [of Hadassah-WIZO] and others. I also volunteer at Out of the Cold, cooking one day a week."

Schlanger's eyes sparkle and her movements are fluid. Her good health confirms the statistics that say many elderly people today are 20 or more years younger, health-wise, than people were a generation or two ago.

Schlanger said her life is "wonderful now," but that was not always the case when she was younger.

Miriam Schlanger, 89, participates in a 5-km walk to raise funds for the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation.

"Thanks to my daughters who forced me to move eight years ago from Bathurst Manor, where I was very lonely after my children moved away, I moved to Manning [Avenue] and Bloor [Street] where my children live, where I have a lot of friends and where I am very active at the Narayever shul. Now I am very happy."

Born in Latvia, Schlanger (formerly Aron) and her family left the country during the war, in 1941, by running some 30 kilometres to the Russian border and eventually ended up in Siberia.

"It was a miracle. It was the only day ever that the border with Russia was open and we got through. Most of the others who remained in Latvia perished," Schlanger recalled.

While in Siberia, she worked in the fields in the summer and in the winter she went from village to village as a live-in seamstress.

Although her grandmother and mother were poor, she remembers they took food to other poor families for Shabbat and her father helped everyone who came to the door.

In Siberia, Schlanger and her father used to walk 16 kilometres to a small shul, at which she met her husband-to-be, Jonas.

After the war, the couple was placed in a refugee camp in Bergen-Belsen, where their two daughters were born. In 1947, they moved to Toronto, where Schlanger's brother had settled. They arrived with Helen (now Grande), then two years old and Liba (now Berry), then six months old. Her daughters Soozi and Goldie were born in Toronto.

In the early 1950s, the Schlangers opened a fish and grocery store at Bloor and Manning.

"The first years were very difficult," she said.

"I guess you can say that I've come back home. There are people here who still remember me sewing dresses for my daughters."

Schlanger has a unique way of raising money for charities. She hands self-addressed envelopes, containing the name of a charity, out to people and says, "Just put a donation cheque in the envelope and send it to me." She added that if people forget to send the cheque, she calls them.

"Charity is my best pleasure," she said. "I just like to help, and every time a cheque comes in, it is better than if it would be for me."

How to overcome stage fright

As a coach, I often work with clients on something many of us face when we are making a speech, performing in a play, giving a presentation or even during an informal talk to co-workers, friends or family. Many people experience stage fright, and indeed some of the best performers in the world have experienced it at one point or another.

Recently, my daughter, Lily, played the role of Annie in the musical Annie. It was quite an undertaking, with a lot of solos and lots of lines for an eight-year-old. One of the things I wanted to help her with was the butterflies that are inevitable for any performer. So I researched it really well and tried to get a handle on how not only to manage the butterflies but also how to turn the butterflies into excitement and anticipation. That is one of the best lines of defence – to turn the lemons into lemonade, by reframing the anxiety into anticipation.

Life Coach Corner
Judy Siblin-Librach

One of the things I learned is that anticipatory anxiety is much greater than the actuality. And, in fact, when I used to be a senior producer on a national television show, many of my guests were nervous beforehand, and I used to assure them that most of it dissipates once they start talking and concentrating on what they were there to express. I used to tell them the same thing that I told my child, that the butterflies will go away within about 10 to12 seconds after you start talking and the time will fly, and when it's over, you won't believe how fast it all went by.

My very conscientious daughter taught me something else about stage fright, and that is that with excellent preparation and commitment, when you know your lines through and through, and your speech is well rehearsed, you have a wonderful cushion to fall back on. She rehearsed every day – and sometimes on her own – and it showed. So hard work and commitment are an excellent beginning.

There are also great benefits to a few butterflies. That's how you get the blush in your cheeks, the burst of energy, the sparkle in your eyes and the excitement to go out there.

Having said that, I remember reading that the actor Sir Laurence Olivier used to have to be pushed from the wings onto the stage, whisky flask in hand, before he would venture out. Even thought no one ever died from stage fright, according to surveys, many people would rather die than give a speech.

So how can not only performers but also the average person learn to speak or perform publicly and actually enjoy it?

For one, it helps to use the excitement to your benefit. Onstage, use it in your character, to make your character shine. In a speaking situation, use the excitement to propel you to explain with passion what it is you are trying to get across. In public speaking, I always tell my clients to imagine they are putting their nerves on a shelf and then tell themselves, "Hey nerves, I'll get back to you soon. Right now, I have a speech to deliver." The other thing I always suggest is to remind yourself that you are a professional and that you know what you are doing.

Make sure to take some deep breaths before you begin. Some people like to energize themselves before they go onstage by doing a physical warm-up, a vocal warm-up if they are singing, and I know of a beautiful actress who jumps on the spot to let go of that excess energy before she goes on.

Imagine the audience loving what you're doing and applauding, and visualize a positive outcome. Be prepared, because when you are, you will immediately be ahead of the game. Take a class – a private or group class in public speaking.

Trust that it will unfold as it should and it will. Show compassion not only for others but also for yourself and remember that when you are speaking, singing or performing, it's often because you have a gift to share.

Lily was spectacular. But the best part for me was to watch her enjoy it and to notice how relaxed she was onstage. It was mostly due to her incredible hard work and determination, but as she would say, "I just thought of happy thoughts and sang my heart out, and my nerves went away in two seconds!"

FIGHTING BULLIES: Middle school students at Associated Hebrew Schools recently took part in a special day-long anti-bullying program. Students were asked to wear pink to show their support for two students from Central Kings Rural High School in Cambridge, N.S., who rallied their entire school to wear pink to school the day after a boy was bullied for wearing a pink shirt. They also watched an interactive play called about bullies, victims and bystanders and how one person can make a difference.

Author stresses tools for successful childrearing

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

An obedient child who never questions authority can become an accomplice of a bully or worse, the compliant henchman of a brutal leader, according to parenting maven Barbara Coloroso.

To avoid this outcome, she advises parents to focus on raising their children to become compassionate and resourceful individuals who can think for themselves.

The internationally acclaimed lecturer and author of four best-selling parenting books, spoke at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue at a recent fundraiser organized by the United Synagogue Day School and the Jewish Family Institute.

Coloroso regaled the 600 people in attendance with her wit and humour as she imparted her compassionate and common sense approach to child rearing.

She emphasized the importance of raising "resourceful, responsible, resilient and compassionate human beings," stressing that parents should be on the lookout for schoolyard bullying and be aware of its societal ramifications.

She said children should be allowed "to experience the consequences of the choices they make, unless these choices are life threatening, unhealthy or morally threatening" so they can learn to think for themselves.

The responsibilities and decision-making opportunities should increase with age, she said, explaining that this training should begin at an early age so that the children can become resourceful. "We should not teach kids what to think, but how to think."

Coloroso said those children who don't learn to think for themselves are more likely to become susceptible to peer pressure. She explained that compliant children may seek the approval of their peers and become the willing henchman of a schoolyard bully.

The good news for parents raising strong-willed children, she added, is that these children often turn out to be easier in their adolescence, because they're not easily led and are thus less likely to follow their peers.

She contends that compliance underlies the herd mentality of genocide. She attributed the atrocities of the 1994 Rwanda genocide to the "unquestioning obedience to authority of ordinary people who ended up committing extraordinary evil acts."

She drew parallels between bullying and hate crimes. "Schoolyard bullying is a short walk to genocide," because the root of bullying or intimidation can be traced to "contempt for another human being."

Physical bullying often starts with verbal abuse usually in the form of name-calling, she said. However, girls are often engaged in what she called "relationship bullying," a form of emotional cruelty: the girl who is bullied is shunned by her peers.

Coloroso said that the female group leader usually wields so much power she is able to get her followers to carry out the cruel behaviour. Peer pressure is also a factor because these "henchman" often follow their leader's bidding out of fear of being left out of the group.

Coloroso said the antidote to bullying is teaching children to act with "integrity and compassion."

She also spoke at length about ways of motivating children, referring to bribes and threats as the "flip side of the same coin."

Children need to be internally motivated, she said. "They need to hear 'thanks,' instead of [getting] rewards, because in real life there are not necessarily rewards or acknowledgment for altruism. Kids need to learn that doing good is good to do."

Indeed, she pointed out that in the Jewish tradition, the highest level of tzedakah is to give secretly so that there can be no reward or praise for this act of charity. "I do not want praise-dependent kids."

She frowns on small rewards like stickers because the stickers evolve into bigger rewards.

Coloroso said this kind of reinforcement activates the pleasure centre of the brain, and that constant stimulation could lead to addictive behaviour.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

CJN helps couple have a baby

By HOWARD and ROSLYN KAMAN

Guest Voice

Anyone who has struggled with infertility will tell you that the road is long and full of thorns. Our road began some nine years ago and ended, in a manner of speaking, in the pages of the Canadian Jewish News.

Like many couples, we waited a few years into our marriage before trying to have children. Little did we know the challenges we would face. After several years of trying "the old fashioned way," we pursued fertility treatments.

Over the course of 11 inseminations, we achieved three pregnancies, but one miscarried and two others were ectopics, in which the embryo implanted outside the uterus.

We moved on to in-vitro fertilization (IVF), a procedure that we had been hesitant to embark on because of its considerable cost and relatively low success rate. In three cycles – two fresh and one "frozen" (using fertilized eggs from a previous cycle that had been frozen) – we succeeded only in producing what medical experts call a "blighted ovum," or an empty sac with no embryo.

Then, in the Nov. 8, 2007, issue of the Canadian Jewish News, we came across an article headlined "In vitro fertilization breakthrough at Weizmann." Reporter Leila Speisman's article provided the details of a speech given at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue as part of Life As A Journey, a program offered by Weizmann Women and Science. The speaker was Prof. Nava Dekel, head of the Weizmann Institute's department of biological research.

Working with medical doctors at the Kaplan Medical Center in Rehovot, Dekel had conducted a study in which a sample group of 12 women underwent uterine biopsy (a scraping of the lining of the uterus) prior to IVF.

Remarkably, 11 of the 12 women successfully carried their pregnancies to full term and delivered healthy babies – a success rate in excess of 90 per cent, and much better than in-vitro's usual success rate of 20 to 50 per cent. Further studies resulted in success rates nearly 50 per cent higher than usual with IVF. As Dekel explained in the article, "It appears that local injury of the uterus doubles the chance of having a take-home baby."

After reading the piece, you could immediately hear the gears begin to turn in our minds. We e-mailed Dekel, who very quickly put us in touch with the doctors she was working with in Rehovot, Amihai Barash and Irit Granot. The Israeli doctors were kind enough to respond with a detailed description of the procedure, which we immediately passed on to our local fertility doctor in Toronto.

As of this writing, the successful outcome of this discovery is now 11 days old and lying in a beautiful cradle by our bedside. Hannah Esther Angel Kaman was born on Thursday, Oct. 23, 2008, at 10:27 a.m.

Approximately 48 hours later in shul, we read parshat Bereshit. Of course, Bereshit is all about beginnings (in fact, the beginning), but, at least metaphorically, it's also about the process of birth. Just as Adam and Eve were cast out of the Garden of Eden for becoming self aware, so, too, do we all start our lives by emerging out of the womb into the larger world.

The further along this road of life we go, we realize that oftentimes, the things we're seeking most deeply may come about from the most unlikely of places, such as the pages of a newspaper.

We need only keep our eyes open so that we may see them.

The end… and the beginning

Ideas on Identity

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

The 84th Hadassah-WIZO Bazaar is over and done. The last one. There is some grieving, of course, and some bittersweet emotion. There are memories and fond feelings, and ambivalence and regrets, to be sure. But one thing is also sure: this one was the last.

I went this past October to say "goodbye." I loved watching all those intent shoppers who mostly had no idea they were supporting Israel with their purchases. And I admit I snagged a great pair of shoes. I went to cheer on and talk to those hard-working volunteers – mostly women – whose love and endurance made the bazaar a yearly "happening." They used to get thousands of volunteers and representatives from scores of chapters.

I spoke with one volunteer who had worked at 40 bazaars and was working this last one with both her mother and her daughter. This woman admitted simply that "times have changed" – the bazaar couldn't sustain itself with less volunteers, less chapters, less shoppers and less bargains. The economy has changed, and organizers couldn't get enough donated merchandise anymore, and there are now dozens of flea markets and dollar stores where a convenient metziah can be found all year long.

And we all know that a good volunteer is hard to find these days. Both men and women work incredibly long hours, and in their precious spare time, they want to "chill out." Many workplaces expect night-time meetings as part of a supposed eight-hour working day, and people have little time left for their kids, let alone hobbies.

And, perhaps most sadly, few young women appreciate anymore the vast opportunities for meaningful interaction, leadership development and tikkun olam that women's organizations such as Hadassah-WIZO (of which I am proud to be a lifetime member) offer.

They mistakenly look upon these groups as little more than the envelope stuffers and brownie bakers of their mother's generation. How wrong they are!

Yet these are the realities, folks. People's lives have changed. So organizations need to change, too. The bazaar made me think of the question that all of us involved in fundraising and charitable organizations should be willing to ask ourselves: what happens when a very good program – one that the community loves and respects – has reached its "best by" date? When its shelf life says "expired?" How do we re-energize our institutions, propel them into new paradigms and urge them to rethink and re-evaluate and press onward when it's much easier to just repeat the tried-and-true "same old, same old?"

It's hard for community leaders with vision to push the community forward. People don't always like change. They are happy with "what is." If it isn't broke, don't fix it, they say. And even if it is broke, can't we fix it just a little, leaving most of it intact, please?

As Jews, we cherish tradition. But as citizens of the 21st century, we know that time marches on, and all things change. I salute Hadassah-WIZO not only for 84 years of a great program, but for the courage to move on to the next great idea.

Moral bailouts

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The sight of the CEOs of GM, Ford and Chrysler asking the U.S. Congress for $25 billion in aid as they flew to Washington on their private corporate jets highlighted the moral crisis that continues to wreak so much financial havoc.

There seems to be a never-ending stream of recipients of fat bonuses – whose ingenuity in creating new financial products is at the root of our predicament – begging for handouts, while hard-working labourers face job losses, home foreclosures and higher taxes down the road.

While there may be good economic reason for these CEOs to use corporate jets in their day-to-day travels (and the resultant savings on flying commercial airlines is miniscule), such poor judgment and hubris speaks to a much larger issue. Perception is not only important from a public relations point of view (one that these executives arrogantly missed), but also from a moral perspective.

In explaining God's desire for not only integrity, but the perception of integrity, the Talmud presents a parable of a king paying tolls, even though the king receives all tolls collected. The perception of leaders being bound by the same laws as all others is crucial to the proper functioning of society and serves as the basis of democratic tradition, in which heads of state must also pay taxes. This lesson is often lost on some and would require that corporate leaders share, and be seen to share, some of the pain of their (ex-)employees.

While financial losses can be devastating, often the emotional and psychological pain can take a greater toll on a person's well-being. For this reason, the Torah emphasizes time and again to have special compassion and bring joy to "the stranger, the orphan, the widow." While the above were often at a financial disadvantage, the Talmud makes clear that one may not take collateral even from a very wealthy widow.

The pain of losing one's wealth is often greater than the pain of poverty itself. Thus, in a perfect world, the obligation of charity extends not only to provide needed sustenance to the poor, but to enable them to return to their former position of wealth. The millionaire who has lost his job may be better off financially than someone who is impoverished, but he or she may actually suffer deeper scars.

While the suffering wealthy may not generate much sympathy (in fact, many may privately gloat over their misfortune), the Torah understood the deep pain of loss, even (especially?) in the monetary realm. This notion has been corroborated by modern research that indicates people express approximately double the emotional pain over losing money than the equivalent joy they experience when making money.

While Jewish law has no concept (in theory at least) of bankruptcy, the Torah prohibits requesting repayment of a loan from those presently incapable of doing so. One may not even "accidentally" cross paths with a debtor, thereby causing him embarrassment.

Based on the above, it would appear that a company forced to lay off significant numbers of workers should eliminate such perks as first-class travel, club memberships and the like, even if the savings have no impact on job preservation. In keeping with the obligation to give between 10 to 20 per cent of one's income to tzedakah, it can be argued that before layoffs are instituted, management should take an across-the-board pay cut that reflects this charitable norm. And perhaps the government should consider "loans" to those who can't pay their mortgages, to be collectible at some future time when conditions permit.

Such measures may not solve the economic meltdown, but they help to provide a moral framework to guide us.

Chanukah menorahs

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

It is one of the loveliest moments in the Jewish calendar. For eight nights, families gather to light the Chanukah menorah, or chanukiyah, to commemorate a miracle that occurred more than two centuries ago. And though the tradition is widely observed, people have practical questions about the lighting ceremony, along with a deeper curiosity about meaning of the holiday.

The rules for the lighting the menorah aren't as nerve-racking as planning a seder or as sweat-inducing as building a sukkah. But these frequently asked questions do appear.

- When to light? When the stars appear.
- Where to light? At the entrance to one's home, facing the street.
- What to light? Preferably olive oil but wax is OK.

The late Rabbi Eliyahu Kitov provides answers in somewhat more detail. [tinyurl.com/menofaq]

And then there is the classic puzzler: right to left or left to right? Holidays.net walks you through each day with both instructions and animations. The short answer, by the way, is both, sort of. We add to candles daily from right to left and then light them from left to right. You'll get the full story when you go to the site. [tinyurl.com/menolight] For extra help, listen to the blessings recited at Tiny Tots. [tinyurl.com/chanutots]

Of course, modern artists have been inspired to craft Chanukah menorahs using a multitude of materials. [tinyurl.com/chanugallery] I took a few minutes to stop by Flickr to see the range of photos of menorahs people uploaded. There are more than 500 shots online. [tinyurl.com/menoflickr] One particular shot caught my eye and imagination. It's a photo of the tips of branch of pine tree that looks somewhat like a menorah. [tinyurl.com/meno pine]

One of the most remarkable menorahs on the web is a miniature silver chanukiyah that was manufactured in the Lodz Ghetto. According to the Yad Vashem website, "when closed, the folding lamp has the shape of a book. It contains nine small oil holders and tongs. As it is portable, it enables the owner to fulfil the obligation of kindling the Chanukah lights even under difficult conditions." It was dedicated on Chanukah 1944. The menorah was found after the war in the ruins of home of Mordechai Chaim Rumkowski, the chairman of the ghetto's Jewish Council. [tinyurl.com/chanuvashem]

Another unique menorah is the 1767 bronze chanukiyah that Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion presented to U.S. president Harry Truman as a token of esteem for the president's recognition of the State of Israel. [trumanlibrary.org/israel/menora.htm]

Speaking of presidents, menorah-lighting ceremonies at 1600 Pennsylvania Ave. are now an annual tradition. The official White House site has photos and videos marking Chanukah celebrations hosted by former presidents Jimmy Carter, Ronald Reagan, George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton. There's a video of the menorah ceremony presided by George W. Bush, but it is somewhat muted in joy because it is from December 2001, months after the 9-11 attacks. [whitehouse.gov/president/holiday/hanukkah]

In an oops! moment, the White House made a faux pas last month when the invitation sent out for this year's Chanukah ceremony included a photo of a Clydesdale horse hauling a Christmas fir along the snow-dappled drive to the president's residence. Jewish community leader Isaac Abraham of Brooklyn quipped, "It's obvious what's going on here: the Christmas tree is being taken out of the White House and the menorah is being brought in the back." White House staff apologized for the faux pas. [tinyurl.com/chanucard]

Over on this side of the border, Prime Minister Stephen Harper has also made a point of hosting Chanukah celebrations. Last year, he said, "The fact that this ceremony can now be conducted in so many countries, in public, in the supportive company of their non-Jewish fellow citizens, is reason for hope that the light of the menorah may one day banish anti-Semitic bigotry into the darkness forever." Check out this site for a video of the prime minister and delegates from Chabad. Both the candles and the rabbis are beaming. [tinyurl.com/menoharper]

First cantorial concert held in Sudbury

By ERIC MOSES
Special to The CJN

I left my childhood home in Sudbury, Ont., in 1982, just shy of my 13th birthday. Over the years, I have often thought about and been thankful for the many lessons and values I learned growing up in the small community.

Last month, it was my turn to give something back. After several months of planning, a group of six Toronto cantors, accompanied by a six-piece band, left fall behind and arrived just in time for northern Ontario's first winter blast.

We were making history. This was the first cantorial concert ever held in Sudbury since the founding of its Jewish community in 1890. For me, it was an incredible opportunity to go back to my roots and thank those who instilled a sense of Jewish pride in me and taught me to love Yiddishkeit and Israel.

The concert was made possible by the committed direction of Mitch Speigel, a past president of Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue in Sudbury; the dedicated members of the Toronto Council of Hazzanim; and the financial support of the Toronto Cantorial Trust Fund.

Several hundred people braved the snow to make their way to the beautiful facility rented for this festive occasion. The concert was billed as An Evening with the Cantors. The response from the audience was fervent and enthusiastic, with a standing ovation at the end of each half. We even appeared on CTV News!

Throughout the concert, I recounted short stories from my youth and paid tribute to my late singing teacher who inspired hundreds of children in their musical pursuits. I related fond memories of my grandparents who came to Sudbury from Romania at the turn of the century, and of Moses Men's Wear, the family business they opened.

After the concert, I autographed CDs and spoke with members of the audience. I was touched by the number of people who told me they had shopped in the store, and who shared a story about my father and grandfather. The majority of the audience members were not Jewish, but so many had fond memories of my family.

One woman introduced herself as the nurse who was in the delivery room at the Sudbury General Hospital where I was born 38 years ago. Another asked me to sign a CD for her daughter – she told me that when I was nine years old, I played Hansel alongside her daughter who played Gretel in a young theatre company's production of Hansel and Gretel

Just before departing for Toronto, we stopped at the synagogue. The little classroom where I attended Hebrew school still had the same desks from 30 years ago. My colleagues were inspired by the pretty little sanctuary. As they ascended the bimah, they spontaneously started singing "hashivenu HaShem eilecha" – "cause us to return to you O Lord and we shall return; renew our days as of old." Their voices echoed in beautiful harmony together. I sat silently in my grandmother's seat overwhelmed by my childhood memories.

Before I left, Donna Speigel, Mitch's wife, handed me a book that she had found recently while cleaning out the rabbi's study. It was a beautifully bound machzor from Warsaw with my late grandfather's name in it. Tears welled up in my eyes at the sight of his handwriting in a book that had been on such a journey. This part of my heritage was being passed on to me.

Today, Sudbury's Jewish community has 28 remaining families comprised of 38 adults. They still have services every Friday night and Hebrew school for the few children. It is our duty to keep the flame of Judaism alive for those who remain.

נינה שנהב

"לילדים שלנו אין חברים בבית הספר." אני מבשרת למאיר, כשאנחנו אוכלים ארוחת ערב.

"אולי הם אנטישמים?" מציע מאיר. "הילדים שלכם שומעים אתכם." מזכיר לנו גננו, ותעץ מזלנו כועס בחביבות.

"למה אתם אף פעם לא נפגשים עם ילדים מהכיתה אחרי בית הספר?" אני חוקרת. "כי את בשום אופן לא מרשה לנו להזמין הביתה." מסבירה הקטנה בחן. "ברור," אני אומרת. "אבל אני מתכוונת, למה אף אחד לא מזמין אתכם?".

Birthright alumni visit Ukraine

By IRENA KARSHENBAUM
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — A group of young North American Jews recently travelled to Ukraine to connect with the Jewish community of that country.

Participants hailed from Toronto, Calgary, Los Angeles, Miami, New York and other centres, and for those who had never been to the region, the experience opened their eyes to the realities of eastern European life.

For the young people who were returning to the area, such as Torontonian Natalya Demberg, 24, the trip was inspiring.

Demberg – who was born in Moscow and had been told as a young girl that it was essential to leave the former Soviet Union – was surprised to discover how many Jews still live in Ukraine. Their numbers are as high as 500,000, and everywhere the mission went, participants were told the same thing, she said.

"Yes, we are Jews, but we are also Ukrainian Jews. This is our country and we want to stay and rebuild our community," she quoted them as saying, adding, "I found this to be very inspiring."

This was especially so given the dire conditions faced by many Ukrainian Jews, she said. Most are living in poverty, are elderly and alone, or are living in single-parent units and struggling to provide for their families on small incomes.

Demberg visited two families, one in Korostychev, outside Kiev, a community with fewer than 100 Jews that before World War II had 20,000. The family was made up of two people: Bella, a mother in her 80s who is almost blind and lives with her 50-year-old son, who has cancer.

Demberg visited the family in their one-room house that has no running water, bringing them warm clothes and food. The family receives food and medical supplies delivered by Hesed, a program run by the American Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) that is essential to their survival.

Demberg was touched when the son ran after them as they were leaving to give them a book of Ukrainian jokes.

"These people have nothing and yet they still found something to give us as a gift."

Demberg also visited a family made up of a mother in her early 50s who is not able to work and her 16-year-old daughter, who goes to school. "What struck me is that they were very grateful and were very happy to get help from Hesed," she recalled.

Holtzbergs were not tortured, says cousin

"I asked him personally. There are so many rumours."

Small consolation for the Holtzberg family, who must now take care of the Holtzbergs' two-year-old son, Moshe, and his three-year-old brother, who suffers from Tay-Sachs disease and whose prognosis is not good.

The Holtzbergs lost their oldest son to Tay-Sachs a year ago and their three-year-old is in the care of his grandparents in Israel. Children with Tay-Sachs rarely live past age five.

Gavriel could have cited the ill health of his children as a reason to leave Mumbai. "For him, it was an opportunity to say, 'I have a sick child… I have to leave.' He is not like that. He said, 'I have a duty. I have to stay,'" Rav Yosef said.

Gavriel, he continued, was devoted to his mission. As a Chabad Lubavitch emissary, he was expected to establish a centre in Mumbai that offered spiritual services to any Jew who sought them. In addition, Chabad centres are known for their Shabbat dinners, educational programs, holiday observances and other ministrations to local Jews.

Rav Yosef, who is associated with Congregation Shaarei Tzedek on Markham Street in Toronto, believes his cousin was following a long-established family tradition. "We come from 180 years in Israel," he said. "We grew up in a house with love, with chesed [acts of loving-kindness]. In Israel, it was tough times. My grandfather appreciated what he had and liked to share it with somebody else. He taught his children, and it went on to other generations."

Chabad is known to send emissaries to far-flung corners of the globe – anywhere Jews might avail themselves of their services. Prior to being sent to Mumbai, Chabad offered Gavriel a choice of three postings: Australia, New Zealand or Mumbai.

Mumbai fit Gabi to a T. "He went to a place where nobody is. That was typical Gabi… He wanted to be a shaliach [emissary] in the most difficult place," Rav Yosef said.

Chabad emissaries are expected to be rabbis, psychologists and advisers, among other things. Mumbai presented additional challenges. Many young Israelis visit the city as a way to decompress from the stresses of army life. Some look to other religions. Some get into drugs. Gavriel helped them all. One Israeli, heavily involved in drugs, was set straight by his cousin, Rav Yosef said. After leaving India, the man became a ba'al tshuvah, someone who returns to his or her religious roots.

Gavriel expected to spend the rest of his life in Mumbai, even though he had the option of leaving for a more comfortable life. "He was not like that. He said, 'I have a duty, to bring Yiddishkeit. I have to stay.'

"Not too many people are ready and willing to do what he did," Rav Yosef said.

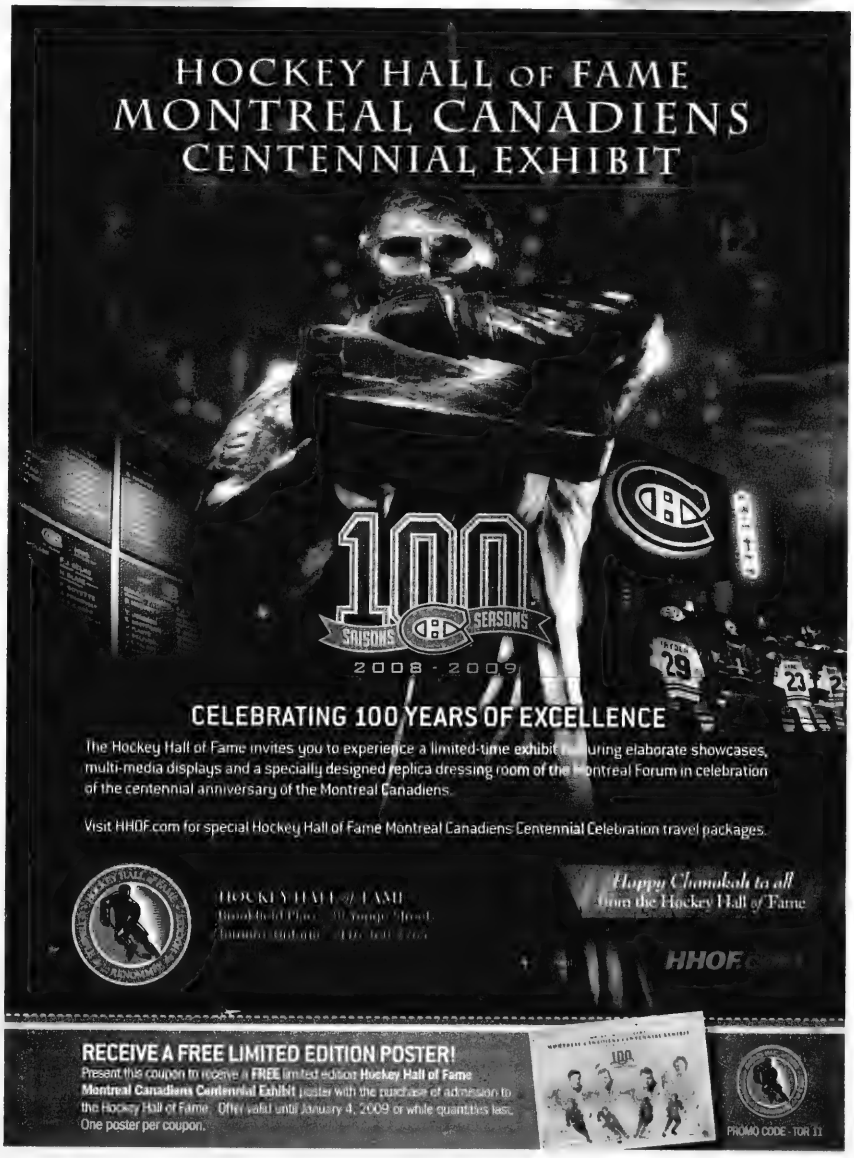
JNF CONTEST WINNERS: Bialik Hebrew Day School students Mia Kibel, left, and Jacquie Mincer were the first and third place winners, respectively, of the Jewish National Fund's second annual Renee Nadal Memorial Essay Contest. The contest was open to all students in Toronto Jewish day schools in grades 6 to 9. Mia's essay was on The Blue Box, both as a symbol and as a practical tool for rebuilding Israel, and Jacquie wrote about The Environment, focusing on how JNF is protecting and enhancing the environment of Israel.



Program aims to keep ethnic seniors at home

Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Jewish Family Services of Ottawa (JFS) is poised to become a leader in providing support to ethnic seniors in the Ottawa area.

As part of the Ontario government's Aging at Home Strategy, and with funding from the Champlain Local Health Integration Network (LHIN) the program is underway in several local immigrant communities.

"I have always felt that the seniors services in Ottawa were only targeted to the English and French... and the demographics of Ottawa have been changing and becoming more ethnically diverse," said JFS executive director Mark Zarecki.

JFS already reaches out to several ethnic communities and has built partnerships with them. In its first year, the new program, slated to come into effect next month, will partner with the Ottawa Chinese Community Service Centre; the Somali Family Service Centre; the Hunt Club-Riverside Community Centre (the largest Arabic-speaking population in the city lives in the area the centre services); and the Conseil Economique et Social d'Ottawa Carleton.

"In the LHINs, there has not been a recognition of the different needs of the various communities," Zarecki said.

"There is a clear recognition that different ethnic communities have their own ways of working with and integrating seniors. We will be linguistically sensitive and also culturally sensitive, and recognize the unique needs and strengths of each community."

Deborah Andrews is responsible for implementing the new JFS program and is currently arranging meetings with partner agencies and setting up a training schedule.

JFS plans to train people from the other agencies, who will then train their own community volunteers to provide the various services to their seniors. The aim of the program is to keep the seniors in their own homes, and out of emergency departments, for as long as possible.

JFS provides ethno-specific and culturally and linguistically sensitive services to Jewish seniors living in Ottawa, including kosher meals on wheels, Jewish holiday programs and friendly daily calls in the language a senior is most comfortable speaking. The goal of the new program is to bring such programs to other groups.

"For us, as a Jewish agency, there is an element of tikkun olam – we are using a Jewish model of service in a sense of helping the greater good," Zarecki said.

"The spinoffs include building goodwill among the various ethnic communities, enhancing collaboration and a collaborative effort to meet the needs of seniors... this is one way of breaking down barriers. This is part of our vision of the role of the Jewish agency in the greater community."

MAKING MEMORIES: High school students from all over the city and from all types of Jewish backgrounds gathered recently for a weekend of culture, leadership, and friendship at BBYO's fall regional convention in Cambridge, Ont.

Yezterdae explores the Holocaust through today's hip hop

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
Special to The CJN

When Yezterdae stepped onstage to spit some rhymes at a nightclub audience last month, he faced a greater challenge than the average hip-hop artist.

After spending more than a decade crafting a rap career, Yezterdae had given up on music and was studying history and political science at the University of Toronto.

It was his first performance in four years, and he was fighting stage jitters, but he knew his song was more important than any he had previously attempted.

The song Perpetrators-bystanders-victims is, as Yezterdae says, "Hip hop, 'edutainment' and the Raul Hilberg methodology adapted in three verses for a younger urban audience."

The song was a final project for a Holocaust course. Yezterdae's lyrics and clips from a variety of media are set to beats and haunting violin strands from the film Schindler's List.

The result is an extremely powerful and emotive exploration of the Holocaust through the perspective of three groups: those who carried out actions, those who stood by and remained inactive and those who suffered as a result. Yezterdae's approach follows the model set by the pre-eminent Holocaust scholar Raul Hilberg.

Jeremy Andrews aka Yezterdae

Meet the artist behind the work: Jeremy Andrews, 30, is in his third year at U of T. In a former hip-hop life, he rapped under the name "scientz," as part of the duo "unknown2scientz."

While he had an audience of underground hip-hop followers and released two albums, Andrews couldn't break through to the mainstream – and he was also fighting against the clock.

"That was my compromise with my mother," Andrews says. "If I reach 26 and I'm not a successful rap musician, I'm going to hang up the mike and do something else with my brain, for the powers of good."

He was headed on a path to law school until he began working on his term project for Doris Bergen, the Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Chair in Holocaust Studies at U of T.

Andrews was wondering how to top last term's photographic essay when someone suggested a rap interpretation would be a natural fit. Though skeptical at first, he wrote the song Perpetrators-bystanders-victims in two weeks.

"Writing rap songs is second nature. I can write a rap like I can write an e-mail," Andrews says, noting that this project, with all the intricate references and historical notes, was no different than writing a rap song.

His first challenge was forecasting the response of the hip-hop community.

"'Keep it real' is just an axiom in hip hop. You don't rap about stuff that you're not," he says, explaining how artists who rap about money, women or guns are expected to have experience in those realms.

"If you go around talking about how you're a fighter, the first thing someone is going to do is throw a fist in your face."

Now a self-described "agnostic if not atheist," Andrews was raised as a Christian.

"Originally, my concern was, 'Can I be true to the rules of hip hop?' Now at the end, it was, 'I have this song, am I still going to be taken seriously given that I'm not Jewish?'"

Bergen understands concerns about appropriation, but says true scholarship cannot exist if people stick to their own experiences.

"Memorialization is really important, but if you want to help other people to learn, you have got to get beyond that. You have to push yourself beyond your own experiences," she says.

Originally, his understanding of the Holocaust was rudimentary, Andrews says.

"I knew the layman's stuff, I knew the names... and the number six million," he remembers. "It was through Dr. Bergen that I got the real scholar's approach to it, deep in the readings."

Bergen says that Andrews did justice to Hilberg's methodology (Bergen, Hilberg's successor at the University of Vermont, once taught a large lecture class there that she had inherited from Hilberg). Hilberg was criticized for identifying with the perpetrators, something Andrews did to effectively perform his rap.

"It takes a sort of courage to engage the perpetrators as human beings," Bergen says. "You can never understand the horrific destruction of the Holocaust unless you come to terms with the fact that it was real people who did these things."

Andrews initially performed the song for his class last April.

"It was electric," Bergen says. "People were stunned into silence."

Andrews became Yezterdae and, with Bergen's help, performed during Holocaust Education Week in Toronto in November. He was the opening act for Remedy, an American rapper known for the Holocaust-response song Never Again.

Remedy approved of Andrews' performance, which was the positive response he needed, both from the hip-hop community and as a representation of the Jewish response.

The audience members of about 200 embraced the performance, flocking to Andrews afterward to shake his hand and to talk about using his song for educational purposes.

The educational program got underway the very next day, when Remedy asked Andrews to accompany him to a gathering of about 200 Grade 7 students from a variety of backgrounds for a performance and question and answer period.

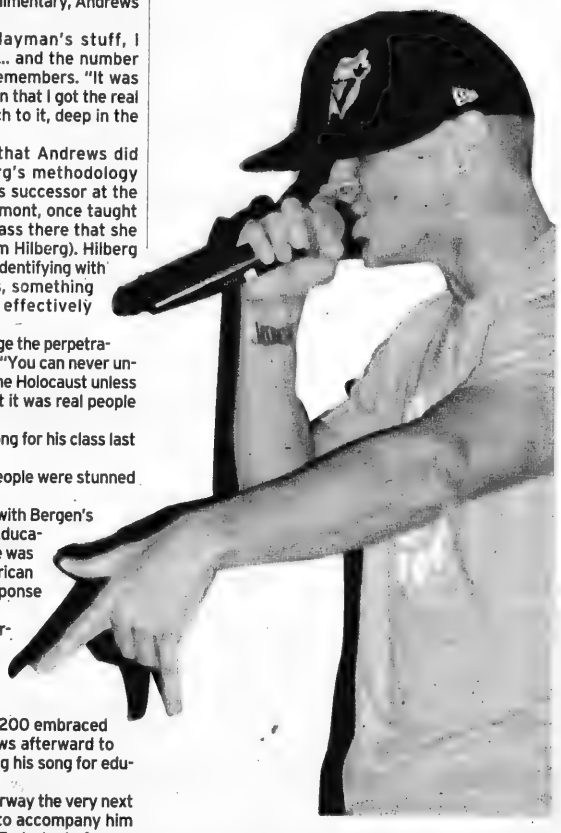
Andrews is impressed with the response he got from the Jewish community.

"I have never seen a community that looks out for its own so much," he says. "It's like from a bygone era. It absolutely floors me."

The success of Perpetrators-bystanders-victims has made Andrews question his plans to attend law school. Considering a return to music, he says: "My mother is somewhere in the back of my head, screaming 'Noooooooooooo!'"

In the meantime, Andrews is busy developing a music video for his song, along with a short documentary, as part of a fellowship he earned from the Jackman Humanities Institute. As well, he received two other grants to produce the video.

The video will be available on Youtube in April. In the meantime, to hear Perpetrators-bystanders-victims, visit www.myspace.com/scientzakayezterdae.



Andrews performs his rap about the victims of the Holocaust at a Toronto club in November during Holocaust Education Week.

Chanukah Food & Gift Ideas

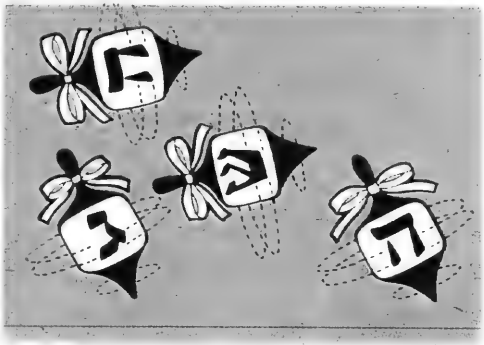
Desserts to please kids of any age

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

If Chanukah is all about the kids, then why not invite them to participate in some of the preparations for the magical Festival of Lights. Put away your concerns about the possible mess, tie aprons around their midriffs and arm them with some basic kitchen guidelines. For instance, you'll be a lot more inclined to let your young ones into the kitchen if they follow the number 1 rule – clean up as you go!

Other guidelines are: read your recipe from beginning to end before you even start, to make sure everything is understood and that you have all the necessary ingredients. Have an adult right beside you if you need to use the stovetop or oven. And be sure to have fun nibbling chocolate as you assemble all the ingredients.

As an added bonus, you might even be able to get some math basics in as you and your kitchen guests measure out sugar, flour, baking powder and the like.



CHANUKAH CUPCAKES

These chocolate cupcakes are sure to be an all-year winner. All they require is a whisk, making them child friendly and a cinch to put together. Once the batter has been evenly divided among the muffin pans, stick small pieces of chocolate gelt inside. The chocolate will melt slightly during baking but then resolidify once the cupcakes cool. Or if you prefer, once the cupcakes are baked, use an extra large piece of Chanukah gelt as a small charger under each one. Decorating with small pieces of gelt is another good option.

1 cup all purpose flour
1 cup granulated sugar
1/2 cup unsweetened cocoa powder, sifted
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/4 tsp. salt
3/4 cup warm water
1/2 cup vegetable oil
1 egg
1 tsp. vanilla

Icing
1/4 cup unsalted butter or margarine, soft
2 cups icing sugar
3 tbsp. water or milk
2 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder, sifted
2 oz. semisweet chocolate, melted
1 tsp. vanilla

Preheat oven to 350. In bowl, whisk together flour, sugar, cocoa powder, soda and salt. In separate bowl or wet measure, whisk together water, oil, egg and vanilla. Pour wet ingredients over dry, whisking just until combined and making sure not to overwhisk. Pour evenly into lightly greased or paper-lined muffin pans. Drop Chanukah gelt into batter.

Bake in centre of preheated 350-degree oven for 20 to 25 minutes or until cake springs back when lightly pressed in centre. Let cool completely.

Icing: Cream butter or margarine with half of icing sugar. Beat in remaining sugar, alternately with milk or water until smooth and fluffy. Beat in cocoa powder, melted chocolate and vanilla. Spread evenly onto cupcakes. Decorate with Chanukah chocolates or chocolate Chanukah gelt. Makes 12 cupcakes

NO COOK CHOCOLATE PUDDING

Let the adults bring the cream to a boil and pour over the chocolate. Then the kids can take over, whisking away until all the ingredients are smooth and velvety. While the puddings set, all the kitchen assistants can make Chanukah stencils – think dreidels, Hebrew letters, Magen Davids. Then just before serving, sprinkle icing sugar over the stencils to create the desired effect on each serving. The puddings are also delicious served with whipped cream rosettes and fresh raspberries.

1 3/4 cups whipping cream
2 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder
8 oz. semisweet chocolate, chopped
1/4 cup unsalted butter
2 tbsp. granulated sugar
1 tsp. vanilla

In saucepan, heat cream just until boiling. Remove from heat; whisk in cocoa powder until smooth. Whisk in chocolate, butter, sugar and vanilla, whisking until chocolate and butter are both melted and sugar is dissolved. Pour mixture evenly among 6 ramekins or small bowls. Cover with plastic wrap (be careful not to allow the plastic wrap to touch the surface of the puddings). Refrigerate for at least 8 hours or for up to 3 days. Makes 6 servings.

CHOCOLATE SHORTBREAD

These delicate but oh so chocolaty cookies can be cut out using a variety of shapes. Chanukah themed cookie cutters are available at many stores but you can also do letters, hearts or just rounds.

1/2 cup unsalted butter, softened
1/2 cup granulated sugar
1 tsp. vanilla
1/3 cup all purpose flour
1/3 cup unsweetened cocoa powder, sifted
1/4 tsp. salt
1 1/2 tbsp. milk or cream

Preheat oven to 300. In bowl of electric mixer using paddle attachment, cream butter with sugar until light and fluffy. Beat in vanilla. In separate bowl, stir together flour, cocoa powder and salt. Using wooden spoon, gradually stir flour mixture into butter mixture alternately with milk, making 3 additions of flour and two of milk.

Transfer dough to lightly floured work surface; shape into ball. Flouring work surface and top of dough as necessary, roll out dough to 1/4-in. thickness. Using Chanukah-shaped cutters, cut out shapes. Transfer to parchment paper-lined baking sheets. Reroll scraps of dough once; cut out more shapes.

Bake in centre of preheated 300-degree oven for 20 to 25 minutes or until set. Let cool on pan set on rack for 5 minutes. Using spatula, transfer to rack to cool completely. Makes 2 dozen cookies.

MARBLE DREIDEL CAKE

Cake and pastry flour must be sifted before using, to remove all the lumps. In this recipe, sift first and then measure, to ensure the proper consistency. It's best to have your eggs and butter at room temperature. To help cut out the dreidel shape, use a 8 x 11-in. piece of paper and cut out a large dreidel shape. Then place the piece of paper directly over the cake, and, using a sharp paring knife, cut out the desired shape. The cake is delicious as well with just a sprinkle of icing sugar on it.

1/4 cup water
3 oz. bittersweet chocolate, finely chopped
2 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder
1 tbsp. corn syrup
1 cup unsalted butter, softened
3 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 1/4 cups icing sugar, sifted
3 cups sifted cake and pastry flour
1 1/2tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
4 eggs
1/2 cup milk
1 tsp. vanilla

Preheat oven to 325. Bring water to boil. Pour over chocolate, cocoa powder and corn syrup, whisking until chocolate is melted and smooth. Set aside.

Cream butter until fluffy. Slowly beat in oil. Gradually beat in icing sugar, 1/2 cup at a time, scraping down sides of bowl as necessary. In bowl, combine flour, baking powder and salt. In separate bowl, whisk together eggs, milk and vanilla. Beginning with flour, alternately stir in flour and egg mixture, making four additions of flour mixture and three additions of egg mixture.

Remove two cups of batter. Fold chocolate mixture into batter. Alternately place large spoonfuls of the chocolate and vanilla batters into greased and floured 13 x 9-inch cake pan, using fork to create marbelized effect.

Bake in centre of preheated 325-degree oven for about 30 minutes or until top of cake springs back when lightly pressed.

Cut out dreidel shape. Top with icing sugar or white or chocolate icing.

CHOCOLATE CREAM CHEESE FROSTING

1/2 cup unsalted butter, softened
1/2 cup cream cheese, softened
1 cup icing sugar
2 oz. semisweet chocolate, melted and cooled
1 tsp. vanilla

In bowl of electric mixer, beat together butter and cream cheese. Beat in icing sugar gradually, beating until smooth. On low speed, beat in cooled chocolate and vanilla, beating until well blended.

Take potatoes to a new height

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

As my friends and family have come to expect by now (perhaps even a few readers), I always approach the holidays with a happy and salutary nod to tradition as well as a hearty and eager plunge into the not so traditional. And so it is with Chanukah. I have to admit that I adore latkes. Not the smell, the copious amounts of frying, or the calories can deter me from making latkes (both regular and the sweet potato variety) every year. However, as is my wont, I am drawn to experimenting with new flavours and new combinations of oil and potatoes.

This year, a potato galette (French for free form) has taken the plain and lowly potato to altogether new heights. Combined with the harmonious pairing of garlic, shallots, thyme and Swiss cheese, this flat but flavourful potato dish, enlivened with the fruitiness of olive oil (which of course was the original oil used in the Temple) is sure to please even the most die-hard of potato latke lovers. A potato gratin with mushrooms is a wonderful way to include potatoes and oil in your holiday meal without the frying. Croquettes, the last recipe, are a year-round friendly treat, but especially appropriate at Chanukah. Feel free to play around with the herbs to suit your preferences.

Chanukah Food & Gift Ideas

Potatoes and herbs mix well

POTATO GALETTE

3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
2 large shallots, finely chopped
2 cloves garlic, minced
3 large Yukon Gold potatoes
1/2 tsp. dried thyme
3/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1 1/3 cups grated Emmentaler or Gruyere cheese
1/2 cup grated Parmesan cheese

Preheat oven to 400. In small skillet set over medium heat, heat oil. Add shallots, garlic and thyme; cook, stirring, for about 3 minutes or until softened. Set aside to cool slightly.

Peel potatoes. Using mandolin or sharp chef's knife, slice potatoes thinly. Transfer to bowl; toss with shallot mixture, making sure potatoes are well coated.

Arrange slightly overlapping layers of potatoes in bottom of lightly greased 8-in. French tart pan with removable bottom. Sprinkle with 1/3 of salt and pepper and 1/4 of Emmentaler and Parmesan. Repeat layers three more times so that there are 4 layers of potatoes in total with cheese on top.

Bake in centre of preheated 400-degree oven for 45 to 50 minutes or until potatoes are tender and top is golden and crusty. Let stand for 10 minutes before unmoulding and cutting into wedges. Makes 6 servings.

POTATO ONION GRATIN WITH MUSHROOMS

1/4 cup extra virgin olive oil
3 cups sliced mushrooms
4 cups thinly sliced onions
3 large cloves garlic, minced
1 tsp. dried rosemary, crumbled
4 Yukon Gold potatoes, sliced thinly (about 2 lb.)
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
3/4 cup chicken broth

Preheat oven to 425. Heat half of oil in large skillet set over medium-high heat. Add mushrooms; cook, stirring occasionally, for about 10 minutes or until mushrooms are lightly browned and any excess liquid has evaporated. Add 1 more tbsp. oil. Add onions and garlic; sprinkle with rosemary and 1/4 tsp. each of the salt and pepper. Cook, stirring, for about 30 minutes or until onions are golden, adding 2 tbsp. of water if onions are sticking to the pan.

Arrange 1/3 of potato slices in bottom of lightly greased 11 x 7-inch glass baking dish. Sprinkle with half of remaining salt and pepper and half of onion mixture. Repeat layering one more time. Top with remaining potatoes. Pour broth all over. Drizzle with remaining olive oil. Cover with foil.

Bake in centre of preheated 425-degree oven for 30 minutes. Remove foil and bake for about 25 minutes longer or until potatoes are tender and the top is golden. Let stand for 10 minutes before serving. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

POTATO CROQUETTES

4 potatoes, peeled and cut into chunks (about 2 lb.)
2 tbsp. margarine
2 cloves garlic, minced
1/4 tsp. dried rosemary, crumbed (optional)
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
3 eggs
2 tbsp. all purpose flour
3/4 cup dry breadcrumbs
vegetable oil

In large saucepan of boiling salted water, cook potatoes, covered, for about 15 minutes or until tender. Drain well. Return to saucepan over low heat; stir for 1 minute to dry out.

Meanwhile, in small skillet, melt margarine or butter over low heat. Add garlic and rosemary, if desired; cook, stirring, for 3 minutes or just until fragrant. Set aside.

Pour garlic mixture over potatoes. Using potato masher, mash potatoes with salt and pepper; let cool completely. Stir in one of the eggs and the flour. Using 2 tablespoons for each one, form into croquettes.

In shallow dish, lightly beat remaining two eggs. Place breadcrumbs in separate shallow bowl. Dip croquettes, one at a time, into egg and then into breadcrumbs, coating well. Place on baking sheet lined with waxed or parchment paper.

In large deep skillet or wok, heat 1/4-in. of oil over high heat. Fry croquettes, in batches without overcrowding the pan and adding oil as necessary, for about 6 minutes, turning once, or until golden and heated through. Drain on paper towels. Makes 6 servings.

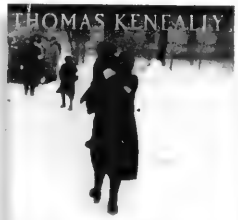
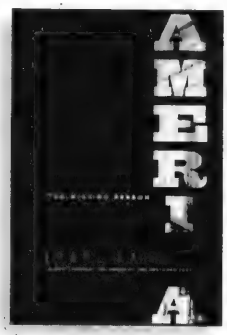
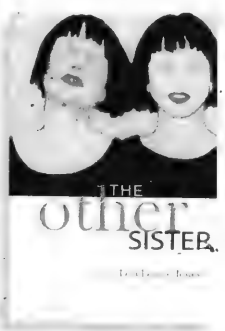
Schindler's List author recounts book's creation

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor







These recently released books make good choices for holiday gifts:

In Searching for Schindler by Thomas Keneally, the author of Schindler's List, describes in detail how he wrote the book, from the fateful encounter with Leopold "Poldek" Pfefferberg, the owner of the Beverley Hills luggage shop who told him he had a "wonderful story;" to the filming of the movie based on his Booker Prize-winning book .

Keneally takes the reader across the breadth of the globe from Los Angeles to Australia to Israel and Europe as he interviews many of the characters who would become key players, first in his book and then in Steven Spielberg's movie.

Full of anecdotes of Spielberg and actors Liam Neeson, Ben Kingsley and Ralph Fiennes, the book is a good companion to the movie.

In Jack and Rochelle, A Holocaust Story of Love and Resistance, authors Jack and Rochelle Sutin recount their struggle to survive the Holocaust as part of a band of partisans in the forests of Poland. The book is more than an account of survival; it is also the tale of an impossible love affair that has lasted more than 50 years. The New York Times Book Review called it "a valuable addition to Holocaust literature."

Franz Kafka fans will enjoy a new translation of Amerika: The Missing Person. With the same expert balance of precision and nuance that marked his translation of Kafka's The Castle, Mark Harman now restores the humour and particularity of language to Kafka's unfinished novel Amerika.

Toronto writer Lola Tostevin explores interconnected personal and global histories in her latest novel The Other Sister. Shuttling between the past and present, nonagenarian Julia Brannon records memories of her identical twin sister, while befriending Lena, another twin, who lost her sister at Auschwitz. Spanning almost a century, The Other Sister weaves personal, local and global histories into an intricate narrative tapestry.

Anna Porter's award-winning book Kasztner's Train is now available in paperback. Porter brings to life an important story about Rezso Kasztner, a Hungarian who risked his life to save thousand of Jews during the Holocaust. This one is certainly a must read.

Also in paperback now is Reva Mann's The Rabbi's Daughter. In this riveting memoir, Mann, granddaughter of the chief rabbi of Israel, takes readers on an extraordinary journey from her wild-child years of debauchery and rebellion to her marriage to a religious scholar in Israel and immersion in the world of the Orthodox.

I leave the best for last. Dalia Sofer's debut novel is truly breathtaking. If you liked The Kite Runner you'll love The Septembers of Shiraz. Now available in paperback, Septembers of Shiraz weaves the tale of an Iranian Jewish gem dealer who is arrested by the revolutionaries after the fall of the Shah. Meanwhile, his son mangaes to escape to America and struggles to find happiness and has an identity crisis. Sofer is an author to look out for.

Three epic Yul Brynner flicks out on DVD

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Earlier this year, MGM Home Entertainment opened its vault to release three powerful epics on DVD – Kings of the Sun, Solomon and Sheba, and Taras Bulba, all starring Oscar winner Yul Brynner.

The 1963 film Kings of the Sun is set in Meso-America and follows the intense battle between the immigrant Mayans and the native North American tribes. Brynner plays Black Eagle, a Native leader who is sympathetic to the Mayans.

At 108 minutes, the action sometimes fades, but the battle scenes are quite spectacular.

Based on the 1835 novel by Nikolai Gogol, Taras Bulba is the tale of a Cossack and his sons as they set out to battle Polish nobles in Ukraine 400 years ago. In this film, Brynner plays a Cossack chieftain determined to protect his land from the Polish invaders. Tony Curtis plays his son, Andrei, who, inevitably, falls in love with a Polish girl, and complicates matters. Like Kings of the Sun, this 1962 film has some spectacular battle scenes.

The highlight of the series is the 1959 biblical epic Solomon and Sheba. Brynner plays King Solomon and Gina Lollobrigida plays Sheba. This $5 million movie was quite expensive for its time, but it seems to have been well worth it. With Spain filling in for ancient Israel, the movie features scenery and sets that are truly stunning.

You're probably familiar with the story line. The conniving Sheba is encouraged by Egypt to bring down the powerful Solomon – but of course she falls in love with him in the process. Lollobrigida is truly sensual to watch. Once again, this sprawling epic has some amazing battle scenes, and a good, old-fashioned orgy is thrown in for good measure.

These three movies are perfect for film collectors and enthusiasts.

On a more contemporary note, Joseph Cedar's action drama, Beaufort, which was in theatres briefly last summer, is now on DVD.

Israel's nominee for best foreign film at this year's Academy Awards, Beaufort grimly unfolds at a besieged Israeli military outpost on the eve of Israel's unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon in May 2000.

Hard and unyielding, Beaufort implicitly questions Israel's presence in Lebanon, but it is not a conventional anti-war film. Indeed, Beaufort leaves the impression that Israel cannot afford to let down its guard.

Wonderful fragrances for him and her

Some recent eau de parfum releases make excellent gifts for the holidays:

Headed by Toronto brothers Dean and Dan Caten, the Dsquared Fashion House has recently ventured into the perfume business releasing perfumes and extensions for both men and women.

The fragrance of He Wood perfume for men is, as the name suggests, woodsy; an aromatic expression of strong, evocative elements of nature.

The extension line includes a moisturizing after-shave balm; a natural spray deodorant; hair and body wash; a hydrating body moisturizer and a scented candle.

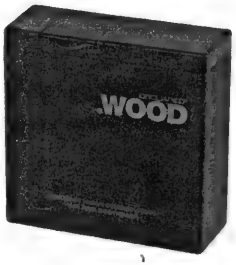
Meanwhile, ladies will enjoy She Wood. Wood is the element underpinning the men's project and its quintessence of virility, strength and drive now acquires a feminine slant. She Wood perfume is highly distinctive, radiant and inebriating.

She Wood's extension line includes a bath collection of body cream, body lotion and body wash.

Both He Wood and She Wood come in 50 ml and 100 ml spray bottles.

Cereus has released Cereus Pour Homme, a collection of four luxurious and exotic fragrances. Each fragrance appeals to a man's sensibilities, using only the finest ingredients to create a scent that is both classic and exciting. Housed in clean-shaped, 75 ml refined bottles, the perfumes are available at Harry Rosen in Toronto and in Holt Renfrew stores across Canada.

The Italian Olfactive Landscapes Collection has two fragrances that capture the olfactive impression of a specific time and place. In each fragrance, the ingredients blend to provide two distinct snapshots; one of an early September morning stroll in windy, misty Venice; the other of a bright, sunny day in Sicily.



Venice and Sicily both come in 100 ml spray bottles and are available exclusively at Holt Renfrew stores.

Bvlgari's new perfume Jasmin Noir is a captivating and caressing sensation. Jasmine is at the heart of this fragrance and sublimely reveals its seductive scent. A perfect blend of woody and almond ingredients associates the lighter scent of jasmine with a darker, more mysterious one, creating a tactile fragrance, one that is both addictive and sensual.

This spray comes in 30 ml, 50 ml and 100 ml dark, glass bottles.

Tuscan Soul is a fragrance for both men and women that is reminiscent of a beautiful day in Tuscany. The citrus top is immediately seductive, which leads into the sensuality and intensity of the magnolia and orange blossoms at the heart of the fragrance.

It is available from Holt Renfrew in 75 ml and 125 ml bottles. Tuscan Soul also has an extension line of bath and shower products.

Winnipeg tackles violence against women

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The executive director of Jewish Women International of Canada (JWIC) is looking to Winnipeg's Jewish community to serve as a role model and national leader in raising the awareness of violence against women in Jewish society.

"It has to be a sustained effort though," Penny Krowitz told representatives of several community organizations at the recent inaugural meeting of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Task Force to End Violence Against Women, held at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

"This won't work if it turns out to be a one-off program," she added.

The campaign is being led by Jewish Child and Family Services and JWI of Winnipeg. Representatives from the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, the Rady Jewish Community Centre, the Gray Academy of Jewish Education, JSA-Hillel, Congregation Etz Chayim, the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre and Chabad also attended.

"Ending violence against women has been our primary focus for the past four years," said JWI Winnipeg leader Mary Ann Rosenbloom, who is also a member of the JWIC board. "With Penny available to help kick this off, we felt that this was the right time to engage the wider community."

Krowitz said that until the mid-1980s, little was known about domestic violence in the Jewish community. "Until B'nai Brith Women [JWI's former incarnation] became involved, Toronto's Jewish Family & Child Services saw very few cases," she said. "Now, the JFC [Jewish Family and Child] has a constant domestic-abuse caseload of about 350 women and five social workers on staff to help them."

She noted that JWI's Toronto chapter operates two shelters for Jewish women fleeing abusive home environments, while Winnipeg's branch has an arrangement with the local shelter Alpha House for Jewish women.

"Jewish women who have been abused are referred to JWI in Toronto by JFC," Krowitz said. "We have volunteers who befriend the women, take them out to appointments with doctors and lawyers, babysit for them and generally care about them."

Although there are no specific figures for abuse in the Jewish community, Krowitz reported that one in five Canadian women has been or will be abused at some point. "We believe that the numbers in the Jewish community are about the same," she said.

She pointed out that domestic abuse is about control – not anger – and that it can take many forms. While such abuse is often associated with physical violence, she said, the abuse/control can be emotional, financial, sexual and spiritual.

"There is a very fine line between acceptable and abusive behaviour," she said.

According to a 2004 JWI report, abuse cuts across all age, religious and socio-economic groups; Jewish women wait longer than non-Jewish women to seek help because of concerns over losing their children and their financial status, as well as feeling ashamed; and Jewish women are reluctant to seek help from non-Jewish agencies.

Jewish women stay in abusive relationships up to 10 years longer than non-Jewish women, Krowitz noted.

"We found that some women will approach their rabbi if their rabbi has spoken publicly about the issue already," she said.

"There was one rabbi in Toronto who contacted us after a couple of women in his congregation approached him. He didn't know what to do. We educated him, and he spoke about the issue in a sermon around Chanukah. He and the JFC received several calls right after that."

She also spoke about a JWI Toronto program aimed at sensitizing high school and university students to the problem.

One of the observations made at the Winnipeg meeting was that there were few men in attendance. Krowitz pointed out that domestic violence is more of a men's issue than a women's issue, as men are the abusers in 95 per cent of cases.

Anti-racism program launched in B.C.

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Grade 6 and 7 students in British Columbia will soon be exposed to Choose Your Voice, an anti-Semitism and anti-racism program launched Nov. 25 at Vancouver's Sir William Osler Elementary School.

The program was created and funded by Fighting Antisemitism Together (FAST), a coalition of non-Jewish Canadian business and community leaders led by former BMO Financial Group CEO Tony Comper and his wife Elizabeth.

FAST's goal is to fund educational programs that urge students to speak out against anti-Semitism and racism in Canada. Choose Your Voice was launched in Ontario in September 2005, and so far, 500,000 students across the country have been exposed to the program. According to educators, it helps to promote harmony, respect and equality in their schools.

"Nelson Mandela once said education is the most powerful weapon you can use to change the world, and it's true – you kids can change the world," Gerry Cuttler, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Pacific region, told students, parents and teachers at the launch.

Tony Comper's remarks were more sobering.

"I don't expect anti-Semitism will disappear in my lifetime, but it can disappear in yours," he said.

"In 2005, my wife and I realized that anti-Semitism is an evil that only non-Jews could make go away. Choose Your Voice confronts racism, sexism, anti-Semitism and all the other bigotries that affect our society. This may just be a first step, but it's a giant first step."

The launch included several touching performances by Osler's school choir, including the song Stand Together, composed by Toronto music teachers Laurence Gilman and Ed Hayes, and Children of Hope, composed by Grade 7 student Kristine Hu.

Choose Your Voice was developed by FAST and the CJC's charities committee and is designed to be incorporated into the social studies, language and arts curricula. It includes lesson plans, DVD segments, suggestions for exercises and resource materials.

Gray Academy launches int'l student program

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Gray Academy of Jewish Education has begun developing an international student program that will enable high school students from outside Winnipeg to learn at the school and live with a host Jewish family.

The school, which serves kids from junior kindergarten to Grade 12, appears to be breaking new ground for Jewish schools in North America by offering international students a homestay environment.

Head of school Rory Paul said that "one of the driving forces in developing an international student program at Gray Academy of Jewish Education is that it provides current students with an opportunity to be exposed to a wide variety of cultures and languages that enhance the education they presently receive."

He said intercultural knowledge is increasingly important in order to live and work in an increasingly interdependent world. The school already has many children whose families have immigrated to the city from such places as Argentina, Brazil, Bolivia, Chile, Ukraine, Russia, Israel, and the United States.

Currently, there are two international students at the school, 17-year-old Joseph Bader from Brazil and Noemi de Mayo, 16, from Chile. This is Bader's second year there, and Noemi is the third member of her family from Chile to attend the school in as many years.

"Where I am from we don't have a Jewish high school or elementary school," said Bader, who is from Recife, Brazil, a city of two million people. "There are 100 Jewish families there, but Sao Paulo nearly has about 700,000 Jewish people."

Since Bader was learning at a private English-language school in Brazil, his parents began considering sending him to an English-speaking country where he could develop his language skills even more.

"My parents thought I could come to Canada, develop a second language and learn a different culture. They researched schools in Canada, and because Canada was receptive, they decided to look into the Gray Academy. I didn't know anyone from Winnipeg when I came. But I have made lots of friends now."

Bader, who is in Grade 11, didn't learn any Hebrew in Brazil.

"I've been learning it now," he said.

"After Grade 12, maybe my parents and my two six-year-old twin brothers will want to try to live in Winnipeg. If not, I may stay in Winnipeg, or if I don't want to, I'd probably go elsewhere in Canada. I'm not coming back to Brazil," he said.

Noemi de Mayo, who is in Grade 11 at Gray Academy, said she heard of the school "because my first cousin came last year to the school, and she told me she had such a great experience. Since I had been going to an English private school, I spoke English, so it was easy for me to come."

Rory Paul

She said that she came only for five to six months "just for the wonderful experience." She will be returning to Chile and won't be able to transfer her credits.

"I will start Grade 11 [again] in Chile in March," she said.

Despite that, Noemi said she appreciates the opportunity to be immersed in an English-speaking Jewish environment and "would tell others to come."

Gray vice-principal Lori Binder said that she'd also like the school to attract students from smaller Canadian communities.

"Jewish students from Western Canada, in cities where there is no Jewish high school could come to our program and live with a family in our community."

Survivor leaves $500,000 for Jewish education

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Foundation of Manitoba recently set up the Edith and Sam Grosberg Scholarships, which support exemplary students from immigrant families who want to attend the Gray Academy of Jewish Education.

"This is a unique scholarship, which we created in order to fulfil Sam Grosberg's wish to give young people the chance to receive an education, having been deprived of one himself," said foundation CEO Marsha Cowan.

When Sam Grosberg, a Holocaust survivor who didn't have any descendants, died in 2005, he left his $500,000 estate to the foundation.

"There are currently six students at the Gray Academy on the [Grosberg] scholarship, and there will be other students in the future who will receive this scholarship. This gift from the Grosbergs will have such a long-lasting impact," Cowan said.

Sam Grosberg left his hometown of Solayev, Poland, for Lodz at age 12, after the death of his mother. In Lodz, he lived on the streets, supporting himself in whatever way he could, such as by chopping wood.

He returned home for his bar mitzvah, and at 15, he joined a Jewish work co-operative. He was drafted into the Polish army at 21 and was captured as a PoW after war broke out in September 1939.

If she's paying, she may own part of the house

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator for 26 years

Question: A friend of mine was married for 11 months and now she's separated. She's still paying for her ex's expensive condo renovations, for which they jointly borrowed. He lives there alone and won't pay the loans. He bought the condo 1-1/2 years before their marriage. Help!

Answer: Normally, the value of any asset brought into a marriage is not calculated as part of a spouse's "net worth" or "net family property." Therefore, an asset's premarital value is not shared with the other spouse when calculating property "equalization" in Ontario. For instance, if in 1980, before your wedding, you owned 100 securities in Google Inc. (wish you did eh?) at $15 per security, and on separating with your spouse they were now worth $100 per security, you would not have to share their entire value, but just split their increase in value, i.e. $85.

However, the Family Law Act makes an exception for any matrimonial home irrespective of in whose name(s) is it registered. So even if the husband owned the matrimonial home prior to the date of marriage and the spouse still lived in that very same home on the date of separation, then the entire value of the equity of that home, calculated as of the date of separation, must be shared equally, including the premarital value.

Having said that, the court can also make an award for an amount that is smaller than half of the 50-50 split if in its judgement a 50-50 split would be "unconscionable," i.e. disproportionately large in relation to a period of cohabitation that is less than five years. However, in your case the court has to consider your friend's ongoing financial contributions to the value of the home. Notwithstanding the brief marriage, she may be entitled to own a piece of the equity — as much as 50 percent. Why? Here the wife may be the beneficiary of a "constructive" trust because her husband would be "unjustly enriched" if he were to benefit from her financial contributions to the upkeep of — and investments into — property that was registered in his name but also belonged to her on trust principles.

For these reasons the court may well use its discretion under the Family Law Act to consider it "unconscionable" to award less than 20-50 percent of the equity (depending on the precise facts), notwithstanding the summary way it would dispense with such applications in other types of short marriages. People should not judge every spouse, in such cases, as a "gold digger."

On behalf of my family, and all of us at Garfin Zeidenberg, I wish you and your family a happy and healthy Chanukah.

Poverty task force seeks to raise awareness

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's two-year-old Half Shekel Council on Social Justice has tabled a new report that aims to raise awareness of poverty among Jews and co-ordinate the Jewish response to the issue in the wider community.

Late last month, the council put out a discussion paper titled Walking in Abraham's Footsteps: Social Justice and the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg.

Among its recommendations are asking the federation to develop a policy on Jewish representation on public bodies, such as the "Raise the Rates" campaign to increase the minimum wage, and asking it to fund and commission Jewish Child and Family Service to increase the number of staff involved and to be visible in wider community coalitions.

The council is also seeking to co-ordinate Jewish community volunteers to advocate on social justice issues and on behalf of the Jewish community and Jews in need.

"It has become clear that participation in general anti-poverty initiatives also benefits our community and fulfils our traditional wish for involvement in tikkun olam," said council chair Gerry Shrom, who took over for founding chair Danita Aziza, formerly of Toronto, who is in Israel for the year.

Originally titled the Half Shekel Task Force on Poverty – which refers to the amount all Jews, regardless of wealth, had to contribute to the first census in ancient Israel – the name was changed in September to reflect a new approach to the issue.

"We changed the name because we realized that poverty was just one of a number of interlocking issues – such as the need for housing, and mental health issues," Shrom said. "We felt that what was required was more of a social action approach."

It noted that Judaism puts a strong emphasis on social justice and caring for the most vulnerable.

"In modern times, the social justice agenda has been retained as a core value of Judaism by secular and religious Jews alike, resulting in the development of social action organizations within the Jewish community and without," the report says, citing Jewish involvement in general social justice movements such as the civil rights movement and the 1919 Winnipeg General Strike.

There has also been a growth in tikkun olam committees at shuls, which take on projects such as staffing soup kitchens or working for Habitat for Humanity.

The paper's authors further note that in larger communities, social advocacy is handled by separate organizations, sometimes funded for specific purposes by federations. They add that advocacy involves different activities, from federations and related organizations taking formal positions on issues to getting volunteers involved in awareness campaigns and lobbying organizations or governments for change.

Shrom said that the "most pressing issues for Jews in our community where progress appears possible include housing – where we are working with Manitoba representatives and community partners to develop new options for vulnerable Jews – [as well as] financial aid and making those in need more aware of available services and supports."

She also emphasized the importance of raising awareness in the Jewish community. The council, she said, has been working on that through a publicity campaign, speakers and a successful program in fall 2007 called "Dare to Dream," a well-attended social evening that highlighted the needs of the Jewish poor.

Ottawa shul builds tzedakah into budget

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A small, socially conscious Conservative shul in Ottawa has managed to accomplish something that the federal government has not.

By donating 0.7 per cent of its general revenue to a charity that helps the poor, Congregation Adath Shalom has followed a recommendation of the Make Poverty History (MPH) movement, an international initiative that was launched in Canada in 2005 with the support of public interest and faith groups; unions, students and academics; and literary, artistic and sports leaders.

Adath Shalom is a 30-year old egalitarian, member-led congregation of some 100 members. Its social action committee – which considers caring for the poor to be a primary Jewish value, and giving tzedakah to be the mandate of every Jew and Jewish group – proposed the measure at the shul's last annual general meeting.

The donation was meant to be a statement of support for the MPH campaign and an example to other congregations.

Ellen Caplan, chair of the shul's social action committee, has long been an advocate of the MPH movement. As she and committee member Danielle Dugas discussed ways to promote it locally, the idea emerged to make an allocation in the shul's annual budget to support MPH.

"It took us some months to… build our resolve, and to put forward our proposal that our congregation's budget include a tzedakah line, and that the amount on that line should represent 0.7 per cent of general revenues," the amount the MPH movement has urged the federal government to allocate to foreign aid, Dugas said.

Congregants received the proposal in advance of the meeting, and the motion passed after a spirited discussion.

The money will go to Jewish Family Services of Ottawa, and specifically to its EZRA fund, a poverty relief fund that provides food vouchers and emergency and medical services.

The proposal stipulated that membership fees won't be increased to fund the donation, and that the money wouldn't come from the shul's existing social action fund, to which members donate individually. The money is a separate, budgeted amount specifically for the MPH initiative.

The first donation has already been made, and the congregation is committed to making it an annual initiative. The next step will be to approach the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Canadian region, and individual Ottawa shuls of all denominations and challenge them to do the same.

Adath Shalom members, both individually and as shul representatives, take part in other tikkun olam initiatives, including helping at a food bank and soup kitchen, collecting pyjamas for women in shelters, and collecting medicine for the Jewish community of Santiago de Cuba that is delivered by a congregant travelling there.

Money also left for Holocaust education

He escaped and was later reunited with his wife, Bluma, whom he had married earlier in 1939. They eventually settled on the Russian side of the border.

All of Sam Grosberg's family, including his parents and three sisters and their families, perished in the Holocaust.

Grosberg became a tailor, and in 1946, he and his wife came to Canada. They had resettled in Poland after the war, but not before losing their only son to a diptheria outbreak in Russia.

As his means allowed, he invested in property in and around Winnipeg.

Before he died, Grosberg told the Jewish Foundation that he strongly believed in the need for education.

"The streets were my university, and I survived," he once said. "But no one should have to learn that way."

Rory Paul, the head of school at Gray Academy, which serves students in junior kindergarten through Grade 12, said that the Grosberg "scholarships are allowing children from immigrant families who are highly successful academically to remain in our school. Without these scholarships, these children would have ended up in different public schools in all areas of the city and would have been lost to our community… These scholarships [already] have had an incredible impact."

Paul added: "Although there is a sliding fee scale at our school, even at the low end of the scale, there is a minimum of at least $1,000 that is required as payment. The children on these scholarships are from families, some of whom have multiple children, that couldn't have afforded this minimum fee."

He said that Grosberg also left "a small amount of money" to help children at the school to be able to afford to participate in some school programs, such as the three-night Jewish retreat that the school runs.

Grosberg also left money for Holocaust education.

Judy Shaviv spent her life 'serving the Jewish people'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Judy Shaviv, who served as a personal assistant to two British chief rabbis and an Israeli president before moving to Canada from Sydney, Australia in 1994, died Dec. 2 at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, six years after being diagnosed with breast cancer. She was 57.

A native of London, England who was born into a staunchly Zionist family, Shaviv met her husband Paul, now director of education at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, in 1971. He was director of Hillel House in London at the time, and she was working in the office of Rabbi Immanuel Jakobovits.

In a eulogy at Shaviv's funeral in Toronto preceding her burial in Israel, Paul Shaviv recalled his wife, a former Zionist youth movement leader who spent a year in Israel before it was popular to do so, as "an outstandingly efficient organizer" and "skillful diplomat," traits that played a significant role in her work life.

Judy Shaviv

In 1986, Shaviv accompanied then Israeli president Chaim Herzog on a tour of southeast Asia as his personal and diplomatic secretary.

"There were very few Jewish political, philanthropic or rabbinical leaders worldwide whom she didn't know," her husband said.

Shaviv's former employer British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, in a tribute that was read at the funeral, called her "one of the most capable people I ever had the privilege of knowing.

"The phrase aishet chayil might have been written for Judy Shaviv. She was a woman of strength in every sense, gracious, giving, helping others," he wrote. "Her whole life was given over to serving the Jewish people, which she did effectively and efficiently, never seeking recognition."

Shaviv also worked for Simcha Dinitz when he headed the Jewish Agency in the late 1980s, and for philanthropist Charles Bronfman and his late wife Andy in Montreal, when Paul was principal of Bialik High School from 1994 to 1998. Most recently, she worked for a high tech venture capital company in Toronto.

A mother of three grown children and four granddaughters – the youngest just six weeks old – Shaviv loved young people, her husband said. When the couple worked at a Jewish boarding school in England from 1978 to 1982, he recalled, Judy spent much of the week preparing food for a weekly kiddush for the students.

Rabbi Baruch Taub of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation said in a eulogy that Shaviv was "a rare human being" who combined "sterling Torah character traits with proper British propriety."

She leaves Paul, her husband of 35 years; children Miriam, of London, England; Aron and Gidon, of Israel; sister Ruth Edel, of Israel; brother David Kosky, of London; and four grandchildren.

Rabbi championed women's rights

JTA

NEW YORK — Rabbi Emanuel Rackman, a leading Orthodox thinker and an early champion of women's rights, died Dec. 1 in New York. He was 98.

Tributes poured in from around the world last week, many of them praising Rabbi Rackman for being an Orthodox pioneer in trying to ease the plight of agunot – women whose husbands denied them a religious bill of divorce.

"One did not have to agree with everything he said or believed or proposed, but one had to admit that he was a remarkable human being and a remarkable Jew," said Rabbi Norman Lamm, the former president and now chancellor of Yeshiva University.

"He made invaluable contributions to the Jewish community at large, to Israel, and especially to the modern Orthodox community in America. He taught the rest of us to have guts. I sometimes thought he relished opposition: it sharpened his own perceptions. Besides he enjoyed a clean argument 'for the sake of Heaven.'"

Rabbi Howard Joseph, spiritual leader of Montreal's Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue and a former congregant and student of Rabbi Rackman's, recalls him as "the quintessential, paradigmatic modern Orthodox rabbi.

"He inspired us to think that we should try to solve problems, try to help people, implement the goals of justice and not get stuck in some of the details."

Orthodoxy's general shift rightward in recent years "put [Rabbi Rackman] distinctly on the left" regarding religious issues, Rabbi Joseph said, adding that he felt Rabbi Rackman's approach was "balanced [and] central."

Rabbi Rackman was also an early supporter of interdenominational dialogue. He was among the first rabbis to travel to the Soviet Union after the fall of Stalin and, upon his return, he drew attention to the plight of Jewish Refuseniks, Jews in the former Soviet Union who were not permitted to emigrate.

Born in 1910, Rabbi Rackman earned a law degree and a doctorate in political science at Columbia University while studying for the rabbinate at Yeshiva University. He served as a military chaplain in the U.S. Air Force Reserve in World War II, retiring with the rank of colonel.

Rabbi Rackman was also a president of both the New York Board of Rabbis and the Rabbinical Council of America.

In 1970, he became provost of Yeshiva University, and in 1977, was named the president of Bar-Ilan University in Israel. Rabbi Rackman served as chancellor there until his death.

One of Rabbi Rackman's most controversial achievements – and, some say, his greatest – was in the realm of Jewish law, where he was among the earliest rabbis to demonstrate sensitivity to the plight of agunot, or so-called "chained women." In the 1990s, he helped establish Beit Din L'Ba'ayot Agunot, the Court for the Problems of Chained Women, which annulled hundreds of marriages using innovative talmudic reasoning.

The court was widely condemned in the Orthodox world, and many rabbis refused to officiate at marriages of women whose original nuptials were annulled by Rabbi Rackman. The haredi Agudath Israel of America accused Rabbi Rackman of "arrogance" and the use of "spurious" legal reasoning, while the comparatively more liberal British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, charged Rabbi Rackman with contributing to the very problem he was trying to solve.

Rabbi Rackman maintained that his activities were within the realm of Jewish law and drew on recognized halachic precedents. And even Rabbi Lamm, who approved of Rabbi Rackman's objectives if not his tactics on the agunah question, nevertheless credits the late rabbi with drawing attention to an issue many would have preferred to sweep under the rug.

After a funeral service in New York, Rabbi Rackman was buried in Israel. He is survived by three sons, Michael, Joseph and Bennett. — With files from Frances Kraft

Obama willing to hold direct talks with Iran

President-elect would offer economic incentives to end nuclear program

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — U.S. president-elect Barack Obama said he was prepared to offer Iran economic incentives to stop its nuclear program, but he also warned that sanctions could be toughened if it refused.

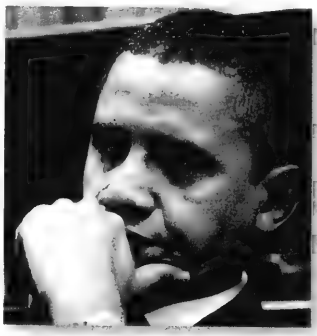
"We are willing to talk to them directly and give them a clear choice and ultimately let them make a determination in terms of whether they want to do this the hard way or the easy way," Obama told NBC's Meet the Press program on Sunday.

Dealing with Iran's uranium enrichment program, which some western countries say is being used to develop a nuclear bomb, will be one of the first foreign policy tests for Obama after he takes office on Jan. 20.

Iran last month signalled it was expanding its nuclear enrichment program, a clear sign that it has no intention of bowing to western pressure. Tehran says the program is purely for peaceful purposes to generate more electricity.

Iran said it did not believe U.S. policy would change under Obama. Washington, which cut ties with Tehran after the 1979 revolution that ousted the U.S.-backed shah, has been pushing hard to isolate Iran over its nuclear program.

"We need to ratchet up tough but direct diplomacy with Iran, making very clear to them that their development of nuclear weapons would be unacceptable, that their funding of terrorist organizations, their threats against Israel are contrary to everything we believe in," Obama said.



Barack Obama

He said his administration would work with international partners to present a set of carrots and sticks to encourage Iran to halt its nuclear development program.

"In terms of carrots, we can provide economic incentives that would be helpful to a country that despite being a net oil producer is under enormous strain, huge inflation, lot of employment problems," Obama said, without specifying what form the incentives would take.

"But we also have to focus on the sticks. In order for us to change Iran's behaviour, we may have to tighten up those sanctions."

Iran's refusal to stop enriching uranium, which can provide fuel for nuclear power plants or material for bombs if refined to a higher degree, has drawn three rounds of UN sanctions since 2006 as well as separate U.S. measures.

Where is Gilad?

At 5:40 AM on Sunday, June 26, 2006, a group of Hamas terrorists crossed over the border from Gaza into Israel and abducted Gilad Shalit. He has been a prisoner in Gaza ever since, during which time Hamas has denied the Red Cross and other international organizations access. More than two years in captivity is too much. It's time to bring Gilad home.

On Saturday December 6th, Rabbis across Canada spoke about Gilad's plight and encouraged the Jewish community to take action. Please join the Canadian Rabbinical Caucus as it calls for Canada to speak up for Gilad on the world stage. Livni rethinking Gaza truce after rocket attacks

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni says she will seek an urgent meeting with Minister of Defence Ehud Barak and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to re-evaluate the ceasefire with Hamas, the militant group that rules the Gaza Strip.

"The agreement isn't being observed by the other side anyway," Livni said, referring a barrage of more than 20 Qassam rockets and mortar shells fired at Israel by Palestinian militants in the Gaza Strip over the weekend.

No injuries or damage was reported in the attacks, and Israeli security forces refrained from retaliating.

One of the rockets landed in the industrial zone of Ashkelon, north of the Gaza Strip. Two more rockets landed near Sderot, a town in the Negev near Gaza.

In a separate incident, a Palestinian militant affiliated with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine died in the Gaza Strip while planting a bomb near the border fence with Israel. The bomb reportedly went off prematurely, killing the man on the spot.

In recent weeks, the ceasefire declared this summer between Israel and the militants in Gaza has been violated frequently, increasing speculation that the attacks may soon return to the levels of violence that existed before the truce came into effect.

Barak said Saturday that he has suspended the transfer of goods from Israel to the Gaza Strip because of the persistent rocket attacks on Israeli population centres, and border crossings to Gaza have remained mostly closed since the beginning of November.

Hamas has so far refrained from officially claiming responsibility for the attacks on Israel.

Palestinian prisoner release approved

JTA

JERUSALEM — An Israeli government committee approved a list of 230 Palestinian prisoners to be released.

The prisoners approved Sunday, who are identified as being "without blood on their hands," were to be released from Israeli prisons Tuesday as a gesture to the Palestinian Authority in honour of a Muslim holiday, according to the Prime Minister's Office.

All of the prisoners slated to be released are members of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah party and are serving sentences in Israeli prisons.

The cabinet approved the releases at a meeting last week.

In addition to the prison releases, other goodwill gestures will be made in honour of the Eid-al-Adha holiday, an Israeli army spokesperson announced Sunday.

Several crossings in Gaza and the West Bank will be open over time, and Israeli Arabs will be allowed to enter areas in the West Bank under Israeli control to visit family members. Also, Palestinian families in the West Bank under Israeli control will be permitted to enter Israel to visit immediate family, and the Allenby Bridge and Mussa Alami crossings to Jordan will be open 24 hours a day.

In addition, Palestinian men older than 45 will be allowed to enter the Temple Mount.

Pollard pardon requested

JTA

WASHINGTON — A major Jewish umbrella group has asked U.S. President George W. Bush to pardon Jonathan Pollard.

The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, the foreign policy umbrella body for U.S. Jewish groups, approved the plea in a conference call, its executive vice-chairman, Malcolm Hoenlein, told JTA.

"It's time that he be released," Hoenlein said of Pollard, a former U.S. navy analyst who was sentenced to life in prison in 1987 for spying for Israel. "He has expressed remorse."

The plea, sent last Friday, is to release Pollard on humanitarian grounds. Hoenlein said other interventions are also planned. Pollard's pardon is opposed by the U.S. intelligence community, but U.S. presidents on the brink of retirement often feel freer to take up controversial pardons.

Russian religious leader mourned

Israel Briefs

One case against Olmert closed

One of the cases against Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has been closed due to a lack of evidence. State Prosecutor Moshe Lador closed the case on the Bank Leumi affair, saying he can't prove Olmert acted in a conflict of interest. While serving as acting finance minister in 2005, Olmert allegedly changed the terms of a tender to purchase shares of Bank Leumi in order to help his friend, Australian businessman Frank Lowy. Olmert is still the target of five other investigations, which led to his resignation as prime minister. He remains in office until Feb. 10 elections

Soldier loses leg

An Israeli soldier lost his leg in a mortar attack from the Gaza Strip on an Israeli army base. Sgt. Noam Nakash was among eight solders injured in the attack on the Nahal Oz military base on the evening of Nov. 28. Doctors were fighting to save his other leg. The base in southern Israel, near Sderot, has been hit before by Palestinian mortars. Hamas claimed responsibility for the attack.

Aid allowed onto Gaza

Some 70 truckloads of humanitarian aid were allowed into Gaza on Dec. 4. The aid flowed as crossings between Israel and the strip were temporarily opened for the fourth time since Israel sealed its border with the terrorist Hamas-run territory after an increase in rocket attacks more than a month ago. Diesel fuel also was pumped into Gaza.

Barak commends security forces for work

the leader of a settlers' resistance committee overseeing events at the disputed house, shortly before last Thursday's evacuation. "This battle is very important to us, because it's about the whole of the Land of Israel."

Inside the house, called Peace House by the settlers, police uncovered a stockpile of blocks, bricks, potatoes spiked with long nails, and containers of acid and turpentine. Caught by surprise, the evacuees didn't have time to use much of their arsenal.

Settlers say the house belongs to a Jewish buyer who purchased it for $1 million and claim to have the documentation to prove it. But the Palestinian who sold the house to its Jewish owner – Morris Abraham, a New York businessman – says he reneged on the deal once he learned the buyer was Jewish. Israeli police say the settlers' sales contract is forged.

Israel's High Court of Justice ruled that the settlers should leave the house until the question of forgery can be sorted out, and the court ordered Defence Minister Ehud Barak to begin an immediate eviction.

Members of Barak's office met with settler leaders, who asked that families be allowed to stay in the house and other individuals evacuated. In return, the settler leaders offered to abide by a recent court decision allowing the house to be held temporarily, even if the court eventually rules to evict the settlers completely. Barak rejected the offer and said that only after the evacuation could alternative solutions be discussed.

Ehud Barak

Rabbi Moshe Levinger, considered the father of renewed Jewish settlement in Hebron, met with Barak and offered a number of alternatives. After conferring with military officials, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi and senior police commanders, Barak authorized the incursion.

The home's tenants, along with the hundreds of youth who had come to support them, said they were surprised by the speed of last Thursday's evacuation and that it came without warning.

"We were in shock," said Aderet Shuavel, 24, her year-old son sleeping on her in a sling. "We had been sitting together eating lunch, and suddenly they jumped out of vans and burst into the house."

In her hand, Shuavel held an onion to help ward off the sting of the tear-gas-filled air. Just a few steps away from her, in the shadow of the house, scuffles between police and settlers continued. Ponytailed girls in long skirts clung to boulders on the side of a dusty hill, refusing to be escorted away.

Unperturbed by the chaos surrounding her, Shuavel sounded a defiant note: "We will return. We will not be broken."

At the house, the police dragged out the settlers through the home's large, red metal doors, many of the settlers thrashing and shouting. Above them was a huge poster with the word "criminals" displayed above the faces of Barak and Supreme Court Justice Dorit Beinisch.

Barak defended his actions, commending the security forces for their work.

"A defence minister in Israel has no choice but to ensure that the law is upheld – without that we won't have a state," he said. "We are only a hair's-breadth from utter anarchy."

Following the evacuation, Israel boosted security forces throughout the West Bank. About 500 police were positioned around the West Bank city, where 600 settlers live among 170,000 Palestinians.

Olmert 'ashamed by pogrom'

JTA

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert called the violence in Hebron following the evacuation of a disputed house a "pogrom."

"Immediately after the evacuation, there were actions that cannot be described except as attempted pogroms by Jews from the Hebron area and other areas against Palestinian residents in Judea and Samaria," Olmert said at the beginning of Sunday's cabinet meeting.

Ehud Olmert

He went on to say, "We are the children of a people whose historic ethos is built on the memory of pogroms. The sight of Jews firing at innocent Palestinians has no other name than pogrom. Even when Jews do this, it is a pogrom. As a Jew, I am ashamed that Jews could do such a thing."

Olmert told the cabinet that he and Defence Minister Ehud Barak "are instructing the security forces to do their utmost to prevent illegal and violent actions by Jews toward Palestinians in all areas under the responsibility of the State of Israel."

Some 20 families and about 250 protesters were evacuated from Hebron's Peace House, also called the House of Contention, on the night of Dec. 4. The evacuation came after Israel's High Court of Justice upheld a government order that the house be emptied until a district court can determine ownership of the four-storey, strategically located building.

Following the evacuations, young Jewish settlers reportedly terrorized Hebron's Palestinian community, setting fires and smashing windows. Two Kiryat Arba residents allegedly fired into a Palestinian crowd, injuring a Palestinian man and his son, according to Palestinian reports.

The two men turned themselves in to police on Saturday, saying they were in danger at the time of the shooting and fired in self-defence, Ynet reported.

The Jerusalem Magistrates Court on Sunday remanded one of the men, Ze'ev Brauda, after police told the court that his actions were a provocation.

Books & Authors

Moses, Pharoah and Cecil B. DeMille

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Cecil B. DeMille and the Golden Calf, a recent 508-page hardcover book by Simon Louvish (Faber & Faber), covers the life and career of the legendary American film director from his birth in 1881 to his death in 1958, two years after he completed his last and most famous film, The Ten Commandments.

DeMille always expressed a deep attachment for the Bible, both the Old and New Testaments, as he referred to them. He was raised a Protestant, but Louvish reveals that his father was Protestant and his mother Jewish.

Of the 70 motion pictures that he directed, 52 were silent and many of the best are unknown to modern audiences, according to Louvish, who has also penned books on W. C. Fields, the Marx brothers, Laurel and Hardy, Mack Sennett and Mae West.

DeMille's first historical epic was Joan The Woman (1917), a telling of the Joan of Arc story. He cemented his reputation as a master of the grandiose biblical saga with a silent version of The Ten Commandments in 1923. He made King of Kings, a film about the life of Jesus, in 1927 and Samson and Delilah in 1949.

DeMille was in his early 70s when he began work on the modern version of The Ten Commandments, which famously featured Charlton Heston as Moses and Yul Brynner as Pharoah. Memorable performances were also delivered by Anne Baxter, Yvonne de Carlo, Cedric Hardwicke, John Carradine, Vincent Price and Edward G. Robinson. As well, the production featured 30,000 extras and 15,000 animals.

DeMille's first choice for Moses had been William Boyd, a sixtyish actor known for his roles in Hopalong Cassidy and other westerns. No matter that Moses was 80 years old at the time of the biblical Exodus, Boyd was likely too old for the role. Fortunately, he turned it down and it went to the younger and more virile Heston, who also voiced the speaking part of God. The baby Moses was played by Heston's own infant son.

Much of the production was shot on location in Egypt. For the Exodus scene, which showed throngs of Hebrews leaving Egypt, entire local villages were hired to take part. "The Exodus stands out as the most crowded crowd scenes in movie history," Louvish writes, noting that some 20,000 or 30,000 costumed extras – real people, not computer-generated images – are visible in the great overhead crane shot in which the freed slaves move out below the stone gods of Egypt into the desert.

Script researchers examined hundreds of sources, including many of Jewish provenance, but the shooting script added much Hollywood claptrap to the biblical tale. One of the six scriptwriters, Jesse Lasky Jr., claimed he was regarded as "the company Hebrew," even though he knew more about Christianity than his own birth religion.

"I want you to write me the first feast of Passover," DeMille would tell him. "Write it from the heart of a Hebrew… You've got to dig. Into yourself. Your ancestors." DeMille was not always pleased at the result. More than once, he accused Lasky of reducing a great moment in the saga of mankind to Hollywood theatrics as he angrily tore up pages of script.

The director's niece, Agnes de Mille, once observed of him, "He prided himself on being a profound biblical scholar, and a great part of his career was devoted to dramatizing and propagandizing the Old Testament, but he never once cast a recognizable Jew in any role except to portray villainy."

The 16 cameras used during production churned out enough footage for 10 pictures. The finished product was an extraordinary three hours and 39 minutes long, but only four of the 10 plagues – blood, hail, darkness, and the death of the firstborn – appeared on screen. The "coup de cinema," of course, was the parting of the Red Sea, achieved using a tank at the Paramount Pictures lot with ramps of cascading water, superimposed with matte paintings and clever miniatures. Louvish called it "a state-of-the-art cinematic miracle."

The film has grossed $838 million to date, making it the fifth-highest grossing movie made in the United States. Astonishingly, it won only a single Academy Award, for visual effects. The 1956 Oscar for best picture went to Around the World in 80 Days, while the Oscar for best director went to George Stevens for Giant.

Film buffs will enjoy Cecil B. DeMille and the Golden Calf for its insights into the career of a great director and the vanished age of the Hollywood epic.

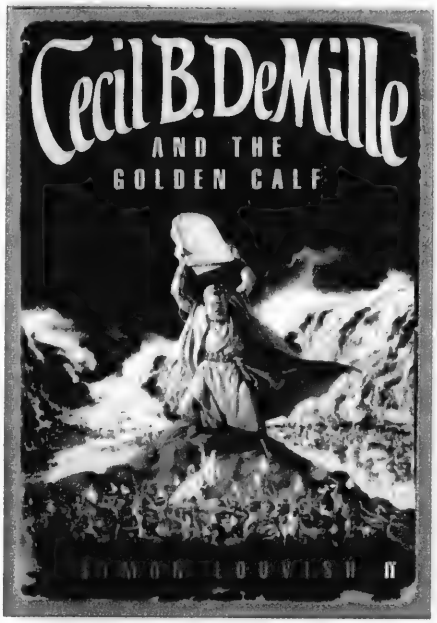
Tis the season of Chanukah – a time, if not for gift-giving, then at least for catching up on your reading with some recent titles from the season's rich literary bounty.

Joseph Boyden's Through Black Spruce (Viking Canada), which won the $50,000 Giller Prize in November, offers a remarkable saga of aboriginal life in the bush country of northern Ontario. The first chapter, in which the narrator describes the crash of a small plane that he is piloting, hooked me instantly. A strong and genuinely Canadian voice, Boyden uses some simple yet remarkable narrative devices to keep up the momentum.



Nino Ricci's The Origin of Species (Doubleday Canada), which just won a Governor General's Award for fiction, is a tale set in Montreal in the 1980s from "one of Canada's most profound interpreters of the human heart." If this book is only half as heartfelt as Ricci's first novel, Lives of The Saints, for which he won a previous Governor General's Award award, it's bound to be amazing.

In the realm of non-fiction, Kenneth Whyte's The Uncrowned King: The Sensational Rise of William Randolph Hearst recounts the powerful saga of the great newsman who built one of America's great media empires. Whyte's sympathetic portrait of the man who served as the model for Citizen Kane makes for fascinating reading. The author surely knows something about the magazine and newspaper biz, being editor-in-chief of Maclean's and a former editor of Saturday Night and the National Post.

Christie Blatchford takes us to remote Afghan battlefronts in Fifteen Days: Stories of Bravery, Friendship, Life and Death From Inside the New Canadian Army (Anchor Canada). A recipient of a Governor General's Award for non-fiction, the book focuses on the ugly realities of war, an unsavoury subject at best. However, considering our brave Canadian soldiers are risking their lives over there, reading this engrossing account seems almost like a patriotic duty.

A thoughtful film about evil and complicity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When they were caught, Nazi war criminals usually justified their crimes by claiming that they were merely following orders. Hanna Schmitz, one of the central characters in Stephen Daldry's film, The Reader, which opens in Toronto on Dec. 12, justifies an act of brutality during the Holocaust on similar grounds.

Schmitz, a German concentration camp guard portrayed by Kate Winslet, is honest enough to admit at a postwar trial that she sent Jews to their deaths during the initial selection process. But as more pointed questions are directed at her by a presiding judge, she refuses to take responsibility for her role in a horrific incident in which 300 Jews were burned alive.

The victims, having been herded into a church, died when Allied aircraft bombed the building, thereby condemning the Jews to death by fire. Fearing that they would escape, she kept the door locked, fulfilling her warped sense of duty. This scene, a pivotal one, occurs about halfway through The Reader, which is based on a 1995 novel by German author Bernhard Schlink. The book, like the film itself, turns on such themes as guilt, responsibility and silence.

Unfolding in flashbacks and fastforwards, and set in postwar Germany and pre-war Poland, it begins in Berlin in 1995 as Michael Berg (Ralph Fiennes), a German lawyer, gazes out the widow. As a streetcar rumbles by, viewers are taken back to a provincial town in West Germany, circa 1958. Berg, then 15, is heading home on a cold, rainy day. When he becomes ill, Schmitz, a 36-year-old tram conductor, gives him a lending hand.

They meet again and again, and in each instance, they have sex. In exchange, he reads famous novels to her, raising the question why she cannot read these books herself.

In each of their encounters she has full control of the situation, effortlessly manipulating Berg to suit her needs. They remain emotionally distant despite their physical closeness. At one point, however, Berg blurts out, "I can't live without you."

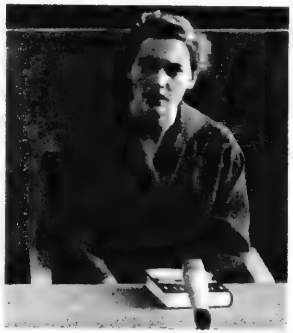
In time, Berg's readings from the classics become something of a substitute for sexual foreplay. Their relationship is fleeting, lasting only a summer.

Fastforwarding to 1966, The Reader finds Berg at the Heidelberg University law school. As a class assignment, he and his fellow students attend a war crimes trial. By chance, Schmitz is one of the six defendants, and Berg is transfixed.

He listens intently as she explains why she joined the SS in 1943. "I heard there were jobs," she says blandly. "They were looking for guards." Schmitz was dispatched to Auschwitz, where she made life and death decisions. At her trial, she is sentenced to life imprisonment, but if she had shared a tightly guarded secret with a judge, she might have been acquitted. As Schmitz, Winslet is nothing less than marvellous, cool and remote one moment and sensual and sweet the next.

The larger question posed by Schlink and repeated in the film is whether justice has been done. One of Berg's idealistic colleagues delivers the verdict, and it is a harsh one. The trial is a "diversion," he claims. Six defendants have paid for their crimes, yet thousands of other war criminals have been exonerated by the state.

After Schmitz is imprisoned, Berg, played with distinction by Fiennes, resurrects his relations with Schmitz, sending her audio cassettes of novels he has recorded. By matching sounds with words, she becomes literate, perhaps even heroic. Does a convicted war criminal deserve this kind of treatment? This surely will be the subject of debate.



Kate Winslet in The Reader

When Schmitz's sentence is commuted, Berg is asked to take responsibility for her welfare, since she has no friends or job prospects. Should he help a war criminal who was once his lover?

On the eve of her release, Berg asks Schmitz whether she has learned anything in prison. Being simplistic, she states the obvious: she learned how to read. As for her Nazi past, it is buried. "The dead are still dead," she adds laconically in a reference to the Jewish victims of the Holocaust.

On balance, The Reader is a thoughtful foray into the nature of evil and complicity, but its somewhat sympathetic portrayal of Schmitz may jangle some nerves.

Doc chronicles apathy during Holocaust

The Simon Wiesenthal Center's newest documentary, Against the Tide: The Story of America during the Holocaust, is disturbing, to say the least.

Premiered in Canada last month by Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, Richard Trank's film claims that major American Jewish organizations did not do nearly enough to try to save Jews in Nazi-occupied Europe.

Judging by the film, which is narrated in sombre tones by Dustin Hoffman, American Jews underestimated the gravity of the situation and failed to exert sufficient pressure on the U.S. government to mount a serious rescue effort.

Against the Tide is also an indictment of the American media, particularly the Jewish-owned New York Times, which downplayed the Holocaust in terms of story placement.

The chief protagonists in the film are Stephen Samuel Wise, a Reform rabbi and close friend of then-president Franklin Roosevelt, and Peter Bergson, a Revisionist Zionist who was sent to the United States to mobilize support for a Jewish state in Palestine and whip up greater awareness of the Holocaust.

Rabbi Wise, affiliated with the American Jewish Congress, was supposedly reluctant to lobby hard on behalf of imperilled European Jews because he did not fully understand the scope of Germany's genocidal policy and feared that a concerted lobbying campaign might result in an anti-Semitic backlash from the American public.

Whatever his motives, Rabbi Wise had to tread carefully. During the 1940s, the period that Against the Tide mainly examines, the United States was a somewhat isolationist and anti-Semitic society where a radio personality such as Charles Coughlin, a Catholic priest, could rail against Jews with impunity.

Bergson, a militant Palestinian Jew whose real name was Hillel Kook, had no such compunctions. He called for an end to inaction and promoted his beliefs fearlessly.

Trank's view of Roosevelt is unforgiving. Like all the other Allied leaders, he believed the Holocaust was part of a greater humanitarian tragedy and that Jews could best be helped by victory in the war. Rabbi Wise, we're told, did not publicly disagree with his friend in the White House.

The film is merciless in its condemnation of U.S. officials like Breckinridge Long. A Roosevelt crony who dealt with immigration and refugee issues during the war, he was indifferent to the plight of European Jewry and placed bureaucratic obstacles in the way of Jews who sought to immigrate to the United States.

In addition, Trank says that a senior U.S. official made sure that Allied aircraft did not bomb the railway lines to the Auschwitz concentration camp.

Nor is Trank kind to U.S. media tycoons such as Arthur Hays Sulzberger, the publisher of the august New York Times. By all accounts, he was "skittish" about his Jewish background, and his editors usually buried Holocaust stories in inside pages.

Comparing Wise unfavourably with Bergson, Trank portrays the latter as a hero who was instrumental in persuading the Roosevelt administration to establish the War Refugee Board in 1944 and thereby save some 200,000 Jews.

In closing, the film issues a warning that the world is hardly a better place today than it was in the 1940s, linking the Holocaust with the mass murder of civilians in Rwanda and Darfur and declaring that genocide can never be tolerated.

On balance, Against the Tide is strong and forceful, but also too long and diffuse. It could have used the services of a disciplined editor. —S.K.

MITCH SMOLKIN, DAVID BROZA, AMONG WEALTH OF MUSICAL CHOICES OVER CHANUKAH SEASON

From an economic standpoint we may have entered a recession, but from a musical standpoint we are as rich as ever, as these upcoming Chanukah-season concerts demonstrate.

Toronto singer-actor Mitch Smolkin, the former Ashkenaz artistic director who has shared stages with Mandy Patinkin and Theodore Bikel, performs a concert titled A Chanukah Song Is Born at the Pride of Israel Synagogue. Smolkin has long ties to the synagogue, where he was a cantorial soloist and a teacher and principal of its Hebrew school. $15 to $25. 59 Lissom Cres., Sunday, Dec. 14, 7:30 p.m. For tickets, please call 416-226-0111, ext. 10.

In keeping with a now-established tradition, Israeli musician David Broza returns to Toronto to perform an intimate solo set for the Koffler Centre of the Arts. Famous for his flamenco-flavoured rhythmic and percussion guitar techniques, whirlwind finger picking and unique rock 'n' roll sound, Broza has been called "a post-modern Leonard Cohen" and the "Stevie Ray Vaughan of folk rock." Leah Posluns Theatre, Tuesday, Dec. 23, 8 p.m. $55; $10 for post-show party; $80 preferred seating with party. 416-636-1880, ext. 222, info@kofflerarts.org

Mayne's Poetry in Translation: A collection of poems by Ottawa professor Seymour Mayne has been translated into French by Pierre DesRuisseaux, a noted Quebec poet. Les pluies de septembre: poèmes choisis 1980-2005 also carries a preface in French by noted Yiddish scholar Pierre Anctil. The book was launched last week in both Montreal and Ottawa. The publisher is Éditions du Noroît.

The collection offers a good representative sample of poems, prose poems and sonnets written over the past three decades, many of which draw on Jewish and biblical themes. Included are poems from two of Mayne's English-language collections, Killing Time and September Rain, each of which won a Canadian Jewish Book Award.

Mayne has also co-edited Pluriel, a bilingual anthology, with two Francophone colleagues for the University of Ottawa Press. He expects it to be launched soon.

Names in the News II: The marquees of the Canon, Panasonic, Princess of Wales and Royal Alexandra theatres were dimmed briefly one evening in late November in tribute to Gerald Schoenfeld, the late chairman of the Shubert Organization, who died Nov. 25 in Manhattan. "Gerry was a good friend of my family," said theatre impresario David Mirvish, recalling that Schoenfeld had attended the grand reopening of the Royal Alexandra after the late Ed Mirvish had purchased and refurbished it in 1963. That was "the beginning of a long friendship," Mirvish said. "He will be greatly missed by our family and by the international theatre community."

Jazz with an Israeli twist

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

The Israeli ensemble Seeds of Sun played warm and spirited jazz renditions of classic Hebrew tunes, as well as some world music and original jazz compositions, at a concert in Winnipeg recently.

The band, led by flutist Mattan Klein, performed at the Berney Theatre on Nov. 15. Klein charmed the audience by introducing himself as someone who "grew up in an insignificant suburb of Tel Aviv, named Jerusalem."

He was joined onstage by singer Meytal Muallem and pianist Manu Koch. The enjoyable performance was the second sold-out concert of the Richardson Partners Financial Israeli Concert Series at the Rady Jewish Community Centre.

Klein introduced the evening by saying, "We are going to plant an Israeli seed of sun in your hearts. We'll sing about love, hope and peace. This is a jazz concert with an Israeli flair or twist."

The performance easily lived up to Klein's description and featured soulful and "jazzed-up" versions of classic favourites such as Bashana Haba'ah, Adon Olam, and Hallelujah, the 1979 Israeli winner of the Eurovision Song Contest. The innovative and refreshing renditions of these and other tunes had the audience clapping enthusiastically and singing along to Muallem's rich vocals.

"My mother is the daughter of Holocaust survivors and my dad is from Brooklyn, N.Y.," Klein said. "Growing up, I was exposed to jazz and world music, especially from my father's background. I found that jazz was a great way to put forward my emotions.'

Seeds of Sun's performance showcased Muallem's gorgeous voice, which was especially suited for singing the prayers Yedid Nefesh and Oseh Shalom. Her vocals were also a perfect fit for the children's song Hayalda Hachi Yafa Bagan, by Yonatan Gefen and Yoni Rechter.

Muallem, who is currently based in New York, was a singer for the Israel Defence Forces music corps. Her upbeat jazzy performance of Shlomo Gronich's Yesh Li Simpatia, a song about the excitement of living in the city of Tel Aviv, was a crowd-pleaser.

Klein's performance of Shem Tov Levy's Samba Chic, with its Brazilian groove, was especially lively and energetic.

"I almost quit playing [the flute] when I was 14...Then my flute teacher gave me a cassette by Shem Tov Levy, and I said maybe there's a chance to make a living yet," said Klein, who has gained a reputation as an innovative improviser.

Seeds of Sun's performance included What's New?, one of Klein's original jazz instrumentals. The song brought out the intimate sound of the flute, which he played lovingly, with eyes closed.

Klein presented his lovely, newest composition, Touch the Sky, which is about his dream "to reach higher and higher heights through my music," he said. The audience laughed when Klein said that eventually he would be successful in touching the sky when "we fly to Minneapolis tomorrow."

What was most evident throughout Klein's performance is that he completely enjoys pursuing his "dream" of making music.

He has performed with the Seeds of Sun throughout North America, Europe and in Vietnam, Hong Kong and the Philippines. In addition to Klein, Muallem and Koch, the ensemble consists of Gustavo Amarante on bass and Yuval Lion on drums, but the latter two performers were not at the Winnipeg show.

Klein, who attended the Berklee College of Music in Boston, won awards in the 2000 John Lennon Songwriting Contest and the 2003 USA Songwriting Contest.

He says Seeds of Sun is looking forward to playing at the upcoming Tel Aviv Jazz Festival in February 2009.

The ensemble's latest CD, released in 2007, is titled Seeds of Sun. It follows their 2004 CD, What's New?

1960s British invasion revisited at Stage West

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

In 1964, the Beatles led the British invasion of America and an army of musical Brits continued to conquer this side of the pond thereafter.

That's the background of the show The British Invasion Musical Revue, at Stage West Theatre Restaurant in Mississagua until Feb. 8.

In the show, Vancouver-based actor Josh Epstein, 28, portrays 10 different singers, including John Lennon, from the early days of the Beatles to the Sergeant Pepper years, and Elton John. As Elton John, Epstein sings a medley of six songs near the end of the show.

Epstein previously performed in The British Invasion at the Charlottetown Festival in Prince Edward Island. "British Invasion is the first rock show that I have ever done," he says. "A lot of this music I didn't know before. I approached it as more of an actor. I got the material, researched it and tried to figure it out.

"We have a big Hollies set, that is probably one of my favourite parts, because it is five guys singing in complex five-part harmonies. They were incredible – the music ranged from traditional five-part harmonies to rock songs."

The musical, written by Stage West executive producer Howard Pechet and Nevin Grant, a former program director of the Hamilton oldies radio station CKOC, was first produced at Stage West in 2003. Many of the original cast have returned, including Terry Hatty – who replaced Burton Cummings as lead singer of the Guess Who.

Josh Epstein

"These are 11 of some of the best singers in the country [in the show]. I remember the first time I heard Terry singing and I was just in shock. I think everybody is in shock the first time they hear him – you just don't hear a voice like that anywhere I've ever been," says Epstein.

A University of British Columbia commerce grad, Epstein is also a graduate of Studio 58, a theatre school in Vancouver. Nominated twice for Jessie Awards – Vancouver theatre awards – for acting, he has spent the last few years criss-crossing the country. His theatre credits include The Producers in Vancouver, Little Shop of Horrors at Stage West Calgary, three seasons with the Vancouver Shakespeare company Bard on the Beach and Mirvish Productions' Lord of the Rings in Toronto.

Epstein is an award-winning playwright who recently produced the hit musical EDGES in Vancouver. After his run at Stage West, Epstein will be part of the Vancouver-based Electric Company's tour of the play Studies in Motion, about late 1800s photographer Eadweard Muybridge. He is also co-writing a new TV series called Folley.

Epstein wrote and acted in What I Like About Jew, which he hopes to tour with and take to a festival in England.

"It is about one person's struggle between family, religion and love, and the pressures of having to marry Jewish in today's modern society, where it is not as easy to marry Jewish as it was," Epstein says. "I performed it in Charlottetown." It was voted the best one-man play of 2007 by the Charlottetown Guardian.

Epstein's father, Mike, was a founding member of Shaarey Tefilah Synagogue in Vancouver, where Epstein had his bar mitzvah. He has strong ties to the Jewish community and to Israel – he's been there twice. He plans to write more plays drawing on his Jewish life experiences.

No stranger to TV and film, Epstein appeared in the movie Hairspray. He also loves music – he plays saxophone and a bit of piano – and on his nights off you can find him checking out live music and the arts in Toronto.

For tickets to The British Invasion at Stage West, book online at www.stagewest.com or call 905-238-0042 or 1-800-263-0684.

Student fundraises through theatre

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

At 17 years old, Brian Lee, a performer, director and producer of local shows, has helped raise more than $100,000 for community groups.

A Grade 12 student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Richmond Hill campus, Lee has earmarked the proceeds of his shows to such groups as the Teresa Group for children affected by HIV/AIDS and a school for children with autism.

He also raised $7,000 for a close family friend who needed cancer therapy that was not covered by the government at the time.

At his most recent fundraiser for Eating Disorders of York Region, he attracted about 275 people to a 1960s-themed variety show, and raised about $40,000.

"It is what I love to do. I chose the music and organized the show, and [Eating Disorders of York Region] put together the silent auction. It was great," he said.

Lee, who last June started Steppin' Out Theatrical Productions, a not-for-profit theatre company, said he has loved the theatre ever since he performed in such shows as The Lion King and Grease, as a student at Leo Baeck Hebrew Day School.

He has also performed in a number of other shows, including The Wizard of Oz, Fiddler on the Roof, Annie, Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat, The Music Man and Les Miserables.

For his role in The Wiz, he received the Randolph Young Company Award for Exemplary Performance, presented by the Randolph Academy for the Performing Arts.

He has also been awarded a Markham Mayor's Youth Task Force Award and a York Region Newspaper Group's Celebration of the Arts bursary.

He is currently studying voice with Elaine Overholt, who has worked on such films as Hairspray and Chicago.

An arts major at CHAT, Lee plans on getting a bachelor's degree, and then maybe he'll continue on to law school. "If I can have a profession and continue on with theatre on the side, I will be very happy," he said.

His company has been rehearsing since September for an upcoming production of Little Women, running Dec. 18 to 20 at Leah Posluns Theatre. For tickets, $25, and $20 for students and seniors, call 905-731-9593.

Lester Pearson was 'slow' responding to Nazis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Lester Bowles Pearson, Canada's 14th prime minister and a Nobel Prize laureate, is the subject of Andrew Cohen's elegantly composed biography, Lester B. Pearson (Penguin Canada).

Part of the Extraordinary Canadians series, Cohen's slim yet comprehensive volume takes a reader on a fascinating journey through time.

Andrew Cohen

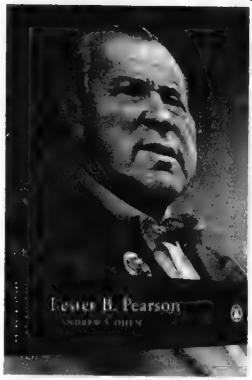
He starts in a hamlet north of Toronto, where Pearson was born in 1897, and concludes his survey on Parliament Hill in Ottawa, where Pearson rebuilt the Liberal party and presided over an amazingly productive agenda during which medicare, old-age pensions and a new Canadian flag were introduced.

In between, Cohen – a former Globe and Mail correspondent and now a professor of journalism and international affairs at Carleton University – portrays Pearson as a University of Toronto history professor, a diplomat in prewar London who monitored the rise of Nazi Germany, and an imaginative foreign minister who played an indirect role in Israel's creation and in bringing a United Nations peacekeeping force to the Sinai Peninsula after the 1956 Suez war.

By his account, Pearson, a self-effacing yet charming man, believed in appeasement – the policy associated with Neville Chamberlain, the British prime minister – until at least 1938.

Close to Vincent Massey, the Canadian high commissioner in London who frequented British high-society circles where anti-Semitism was a given, Pearson was virtually oblivious to Germany's persecution of its Jewish citizens.

As Cohen puts it, "Pearson's memoirs scarcely mention Hitler's war upon the Jews… Pearson was wise and perceptive in many things, but not here. In his response to the Nazis – in private or public – he was slow, late and tepid."



But after Germany's annexation of Austria, Pearson opened his eyes and his isolationism began to crack. Cohen quotes Pearson as writing, "No longer was it possible for me to believe that Nazism was a temporary aberration in German politics, that the good sense of the German people would soon take care of the Fuhrer."

By 1939, the outbreak of the war, Pearson had gone well beyond appeasement and isolationism, suggesting that Nazism represented a descent into "savagery and barbarism." Once war on the European continent erupted and Canada was militarily involved in it, Pearson was a hawk, urging the Canadian prime minister to commit all resources to it.

In 1947, as the United Nations debated the Palestine question, Canada was appointed to a special UN committee to decide its fate. Pearson, then undersecretary of state for external affairs, made himself useful by proposing the formation of a four-nation working group that eventually "drafted the terms that produced the state of Israel." Cohen, presumably due to lack of space, does not elaborate.

According to Cohen, Pearson, a pragmatist, was not a committed Zionist. "Contrary to what some suggest, he wasn't predisposed to a Jewish state." Yet to his underlings at External Affairs, Cohen adds, Pearson was considered "king of the Jews."

Pearson's greatest triumph in statecraft occurred in the wake of Israel's 1956 war with Egypt, when he had been foreign minister for eight years. "It was an opportunity made for Pearson, drawing on talents forged in a diplomatic career now reaching its zenith," Cohen observes. "Nothing before or after was as momentous for him. In his long, eventful public life, Suez was his signature."

Pearson, having been caught by surprise by Britain and France's invasion of Egypt in concert with Israel, was angry when the British foreign minister, Anthony Eden, appealed for Canada's "understanding" and "support."

Having known him for years, he was surprised by Eden's recklessness. To Pearson, the Anglo-French incursion was immoral, illegal, impractical and a burden on Britain's alliance with the United States, which opposed the war.

Amid the confusion and acrimony, Pearson urged the United Nations General Assembly to authorize "a UN police force large enough to keep these borders at peace while a political settlement is being worked out."

The United States supported the plan, as did Britain and France. Shortly afterward, a motion was passed, authorizing the secretary general to establish an emergency international force to supervise Israel's ceasefire with Egypt.

Cohen discloses that the historic resolution, passed 57-0, with 19 abstentions, was actually drafted by the U.S. State Department, and then delivered by Pearson. The UN force, commanded by a Canadian general, E.L.M. Burns, took up positions in mid-November.

Cohen has high praise for Pearson. "At the centre of the whirlwind he was the master of events, the imperturbable Lester Pearson. It was he made or modified the proposals, presented the critical resolutions, enlisted support, persuaded skeptics." It was, he says in Churchillian tones, "Pearson's finest hour."

Yet in Canada, Pearson's achievement touched off a firestorm. The philo-British Conservative party was aghast that Canada had not supported Britain, and one of its leading lights claimed that Pearson had sullied himself by being "a chore boy for the United States."

But in Sweden, Pearson was hailed as a hero and was awarded the Nobel Prize for peace. Burnishing his reputation, the award conferred "a kind of holy legitimacy" on Pearson. It also gave Canada a new vocation – peacekeeping.

In summation, Cohen writes that Suez was "a high-water mark" for Pearson as a diplomat par excellence. "Nothing he did as prime minister surpassed it." Thanks to his stellar contributions, Pearson was elected president of the UN General Assembly and twice almost became the UN's secretary general.

There was a consolation prize. On April 22, 1963, when he was 65, he took up his job as Canada's prime minister. Cohen describes his tenure at length and has kind words for him.

"After the steely Pierre Trudeau, the hyperbolic Brian Mulroney, the cautious Jean Chrétien, the fumbling Paul Martin Jr., and the dour Stephen Harper, we appreciate the character of Lester Pearson [and] his stewardship. In the context of today's minority government, and the general decline of civility in politics, the 1960s don't look so shrill or chaotic or antagonistic."

In short, Pearson was a remarkable man whose moderation and pragmatism served Canada and the world quite well. Cohen's book tells the story quite well.

Birthright alumni visit Ukrainian Jews

She added, "Most of their Jewish friends were [made] through JDC-sponsored programs, which pointed to how important these programs are."

Calgarian Jennifer Hadley, 27, also visited two families. One was the Limonnik family of Kiev, made up of a grandmother, her 33-year-old daughter and the daughter's two small children.

The daughter's husband died of a heart attack in front of the children and the family now lives on two monthly pensions, the grandmother's $105 and the late husband's $110. The daughter suffers from cardiovascular disease and is unable to find work.

Hadley said she visited the family in their run-down, two-room apartment, where all four live in one room and sleep on one bed. "The grandmother has a sister who has a mental illness and is locked up in a second room, because they can't afford to get help," Hadley said.

Despite these hardships, the family still clings to its Jewish traditions and community. The children attend a Jewish school and participate in various Jewish programs, all administered and sponsored by Hesed.

Both Demberg and Hadley said all the people they visited asked, "Tell everyone that there are still Jews here. Don't forget us."

Both women want to tell the stories of the Ukrainian Jews they met. Hadley, who owns a spa in Calgary with her mother, said her family will be making a donation to the JDC. Demberg, a consultant in Toronto, is actively seeking volunteer opportunities to help Ukrainian Jews.

The mission to Ukraine was organized by Birthright Israel Next for alumni of Taglit-Birthright Israel, which provides free, educational trips to Israel for Jews ages 18 to 26.

While in the Ukraine, Jennifer Hadley also visited 91-year old Mila Goldfarb, who lives alone in Korostychev. Goldfarb was orphaned at the age of 10 and her fiancé was killed in World War II. She never married and lives alone in a house with an outhouse and no utilities.

Stars of David to compete in multicultural tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Stars of David are hoping to do what their predecessors, the Israeli Maccabees, couldn't quite manage in years gone by – win the title of the Canadian Multicultural Hockey Championships.

The Stars are one of 22 men's teams who will compete in the mid-winter hockey fest, which will run from Dec. 27 to 30 at Chesswood Arena. A six-team women's tournament rounds out the event, now in its fourth year.

The Maccabees missed the first season because some games fell on Shabbat, but three years ago they iced a team, and two years ago they advanced to the finals, only to lose to the Irish Shamrocks. Last year they were 2-2, said Alex Voihanski, coach and manager of the Stars.

Voihanski, who changed the team's name to the Stars "because I just like the sound of it," said they should contend for top spot in the tournament. The talented nucleus from last year's team is eager to return and could be bolstered by solid acquisitions that might put the team over the top.

Boys in blue looking for gold.

Two quality additions he is hoping to entice are forward Michael Henrich, a onetime first round pick of the Edmonton Oilers, and former AHL scorer and European pro Todd Simon. Along with the likes of Stacey Britstone, who played with the Plymouth Whalers of the OHL, Adam Weinberg (University of Toronto), Jordan Weinberg, Daniel Spivak (Israeli national team and NCAA Division 1), Elliot Shully, Aaron Stein, and Ira Greenberg, the team should be strong, Voihanski said.

"We're talking about a very competitive team here," he said. "We'll be one of the top teams."

Stanley Papulkas, who conceived of the tournament and brought all the pieces together four years ago, said that he "was very impressed with the Israeli team last year."

The tournament attracts a lot of quality players and the better teams are comparable to some European professional squads, he said. They play with passion and pride, and despite the competitiveness of the players, "there has not been one fight on the ice in three years… There is mutual respect from everybody."

Papulkas said the tournament has proven to be a success "because of the people who are part of it and who believe in it. It's a concept that brings all Canadians together. All are proud to be Canadian and proud of their heritage."

The Stars of David will play in a division with the Shamrocks, the Scottish Marauders and the Iroquois Silverhawks. Other teams in the tournament include the Kashubian Griffins, Hellenic Lightning, the Polish Hussars, the Portuguese Sea Wolves, the Chinese Ice Dragons, the Maltese Falcons, the Nubian Kings and the Serbo/Croatian Eagles.

Former Toronto Maple Leaf Peter Zezel has played for the Eagles in past years, while ex-Leaf Nikolai Borschevsky has suited up for the Russians. Many teams boast ex-pros on their rosters, though each is limited to two "icon" players – those who played for at least 25 games in the NHL.

Voihanski said his company, Chai Life Sports, will sponsor the Stars, paying entry fees, providing jerseys and other apparel.

Papulkas, an executive with CFMT Multilingual Televsion (OMNI) who has moved to Edmonton, said he is hoping to put together a similar event in the western city. His dream would be for regional champions to get together for an annual cross-Canada championship. A more short-term goal is to create a season-long multicultural hockey league that "builds community support" for each team, he said.

Discontinuing life-support

By MICHAEL GORDON

"You might as well just kill her. Why not shoot her and get it over with?"

"It is an act of euthanasia – I thought euthanasia was outlawed in this country."

"I am going to report you to the media – you can't just kill people you know."

"Stopping the respirator is the same as killing her. Is that the business you are in?"

These are some of the comments I've heard over the past few years from family members faced with the conundrum of discontinuing life-sustaining respirator treatment in Intensive Care Units (ICU).

The Senior Side of Life

Recently, when an Orthodox Jewish Winnipeg man was kept on a respirator after the ICU physicians felt that life-support should be discontinued, the flame of controversy was fuelled. The Canadian and Israeli media weighed in, with some writers characterizing the situation as "euthanasia." Some religious leaders said the issue was one of religious freedom. When the man died before the case could go to trial – family members were going to argue that life-support should continue – the patient's death was described as "natural" by the family.

How are health-care providers – who pursue the best of life-saving treatments in our intensive care units – to deal with allegations that they are cruel, or that they are "ignoring religious beliefs" or "killing beloved family members," when they believe their efforts have been unsuccessful?

In medicine, those who are knowledgeable about the limits of life-support methods and the likelihood of recovery from end-stage conditions when vital organs fail, can usually predict accurately when further treatment is not clinically beneficial.

This medical perspective may conflict with the family's personal, religious or psychological perspective. Losing a loved one is never easy, and having the process interface with the complexities of modern medical technology doesn't make it any easier.

Before the advances in life-support technologies were made, many older individuals, especially those with late-stage heart, brain and kidney diseases, died from their diseases without any attempt made to prolong their lives. There was no option of discontinuing life-sustaining treatment. Today, with the increased access to and common use of life-support technologies, individuals with previously fatal diseases receive a reprieve from death with life-support technologies.

The reason these technologies are used is that some individuals now recover from illnesses that previously would have led to their deaths. With such treatments, however, some of those who recover are left with severe disabilities or, unfortunately, in permanent coma or some comparable state. Nevertheless, the new standard for life-support in ICUs has become in essence, "Give people the best possible chance for recovery."

The problem is that when the life-support treatment does not achieve its goals, it has to be discontinued. One cannot keep a person on life-support indefinitely. That's the emotional problem for families. For some people who have strong religious convictions, it is easier to not start a treatment than to stop it. So, if we don't agree to stop treatment when it doesn't work, we could in essence end up depriving people of the chance to respond to such attempts at treatment.

Using life-support is not "natural." As a means of keeping someone alive, it is "artificial." Allowing someone to die from their disease after life-support has been tried but failed is what is "natural," and it must be allowed to happen with the tenderness, care and love that the person deserves – not with the hostility, anger and disapproval that unfortunately often occur when the subject of discontinuing life-support arises.

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press).

MANDY PATINKIN'S MOM'S POTATO LATKES

- 6 large white potatoes
- 1 large onion
- 2 eggs (or 1/2 cup egg substitute)
- 2 egg whites
- 2/3 cup flour or matzo meal
- 1 tsp. baking powder
- 1.2 tsp. garlic powder
- 1 tsp. salt
- 1/2 tsp. white pepper
- peanut oil for frying

Peel potatoes and onion. (If not using immediately, place in cold water.) Grate with the shredding blade of food processor. Put grated potatoes in large strainer and press out liquid. Pour cold water over potatoes and press out liquid once more. Transfer to large mixing bowl. Add onions. Beat eggs and egg whites until thick. Add to potatoes and onions. Add flour or matzo meal, baking powder, and seasonings. Mix well. Heat oil in frying pan. When ready, drop batter by large soup spoonfuls to form oval shapes. Fry over moderate to high heat until brown on one side; turn to brown other side. Remove from frying pan and drain on paper towels. Serve with sour ceam or applesauce.

What teaching is all about

Epi on Education

All teachers wonder what happens to the material they teach once it has been taught.

Does its having been taught necessarily mean that it was learned? And if it was successfully learned, has it been internalized and integrated with other relevant information? Will it be remembered? Will it ever be used? Will the student be able to learn new things autonomously because of the experience in the classroom?

Seymour Epstein

There are times when a teacher gets feedback months or years later that affirms that something clicked – that a teaching was indeed internalized and applied.

I have one of those memories from the 1970s. I was teaching Talmud in a junior high school, and in the course of studying a particular sugya (unit of discourse), reference was made to a proof text from Deuteronomy. Since the connection between the biblical text and the legal argument in the Talmud was complex, we spent a considerable amount of time on one verse of the Torah.

The following summer, I was working in a camp where one of my students was a camper. During the Shabbat morning Torah reading, we happened on that verse, at which point my camper looked at me and winked. That moment was worth all the salary I earned that year from teaching.

Once again, a few weeks ago, I was spending a Shabbat retreat with some of my York University students. Last year, we studied classical texts that relate to the festivals and Shabbat. We spent a considerable amount of time on one line of Aramaic that some Jews recite Friday night at the Shabbat table, since I am convinced that there are secrets about the significance of Shabbat in the recitation of that line. As observant as some of my students are, they had not encountered the phrase before.

But just before Kiddush on the wine, two of my students told me that as we sang Shalom Aleichem and they saw me, they thought of the Aramaic phrase that we had studied the year before.

As trivial as these moments might seem to someone else, they and others like them have constantly affirmed that when we teachers succeed, the learning takes, and lasts forever.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Mumbai: a challenging test

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Describe human nature. Do we all have the equal capacity to create and destroy? Are we "good," and are all those who aggressively take others' lives "evil"? Is there something we haven't thought of that might change the world so that peaceful people would have a greater influence on those willing to cause suffering? Are those who cause suffering ever remorseful?

URBAN WRITER

These were the questions following humanity's ejection from the Garden of Eden, and they're the focus of many today after the massacre in Mumbai.

The predominant belief is that the young men in Mumbai who took 183 lives were "evil." That is clear, the world says, adding that it's good that those smiling Satans are dead.

But is it that simple?

On March 16, 1968, during the war in Vietnam, a massacre was committed by American soldiers at My Lai. A company of 30, drunk and high, entered this quiet village where mothers and grandmothers were feeding children breakfast and indiscriminately stabbed, gang-raped, shot and killed 500 people – women and children.

When the village was calm with death, a three-year-old boy climbed out of a pile of bodies and ran. An American soldier, William Calley Jr., ran after him and executed him, shooting him in the head and back. (A woman who lived across the street from the Calleys for several years told Time magazine in 1969: "He was a wonderful boy and would do anything for you.")

Of the 26 officers and soldiers accused in connection with the massacre, Calley was the only one whose charges stuck. He was found guilty of killing 22 civilians and given a life sentence. Calley served 3-1/2 years under house arrest. Today, he lives in Atlanta.

Those who pulled the triggers in Mumbai have caused incalculable suffering to the Jewish People and the world. A little boy, Moshe, is an orphan, and a woman in Virginia is a widow and grieving her 13-year-old daughter. This type of suffering never ends. I have seen it in my family.

But what of the suffering after My Lai? What is it in our nature that encourages us to vilify certain barbaric actions and be OK with others? Baruch Goldstein, the West Bank doctor who in 1994 killed 29 people who were praying in Hebron's Ibrahimi Mosque (and wounded 150 others) is one such example. His grave has become a shrine. It is confusing.

Furthermore, what makes a person so mad that they're able to look in a child's eyes and see them as the "other," thereby making them an acceptable target for an AK-47 bullet?

Seymour Hersh, the national security correspondent for the New Yorker, writes that he has spoken with officers, company commanders and platoon leaders in Iraq, many of whom "can't stand their job, because 95 per cent of their time is spent keeping kids from doing terrible things to the civilian population of Iraq." How and when did those normal American boys lose their ability to discern between the innocent and the guilty?

Mumbai has raised many questions. Is "good versus evil" so simple? Is there anything we haven't considered when dealing with hatred and destruction in our world? How do young people become so blind that they're able to murder with conceit? Are they prideful throughout their rampage? Is there any way to restore the sight of those who follow them? What moral gauge do we use to mete out punishment, and when do we use it?

A good, healthy friend told me, "Once, when I was young, I got so angry that in another second, I could have killed my mother."

What does that mean? Describe human nature.

Anxiety levels rise as Gaza truce ends

By AMOS HAREL and AVI ISSACHAROFF
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said Sunday that Israel must respond to every rocket fired from the Gaza Strip, adding that a truce marked by constant attacks is meaningless.

"As longaas Hamas continues to operate with terror from Gaza, Israel will operate with its own means," Livni said during talks with her visiting Austrian counterpart, Michael Spindelegger.

Ceasefire set to expire Dec. 19

"The government is responsible for the citizens of the state. It... must respond to terror through military means," she said. "We cannot allow Gaza to remain under Hamas control."

Hamas leadership in Damascus announced earlier Sunday that the Islamist militant group would not renew its six-month-old truce with Israel in the Gaza Strip, set to expire on Friday.

"There will be no renewal of the calm after it expires," the statement quoted the group's exiled leader Khaled Meshal as telling a Hamas television station.

However, Hamas officials based in the Gaza Strip took a less definitive line, leaving open the possibility of negotiation before the Egyptian-brokered pact ends.

"The truce will not be renewed as long as there is no real and full Israeli commitment," one Gaza official said in response to the report of Meshal's remarks to Al-Quds Television. But "if the occupier's position changes, it will be studied."

A spokesperson for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Israel was prepared to maintain the truce, but would not do so if Hamas continues to violate it by allowing militants to fire rockets at the Negev.

"Israel has been, and continues to be, ready to abide by the understandings negotiated through Egypt," government spokesperson Mark Regev said. "But it is clear that we won't be doing so unilaterally," he added, in view of what he called Hamas' "daily grave violations of those understandings."

Priest donates Scotch to synagogue fundraiser

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Have you heard the one about the priest, the rabbi and the bottle of Scotch?

The priest is Father Vittorio Tucci, curate of Holy Cross Church in the Ville Emard neighbourhood of Montreal; the rabbi is Avrohom Jacks, spiritual leader of Congregation Zichron Kedoshim in Snowdon; and the whisky, a 1926 Dewar's still in its original wrapper.

The bottle was the most expensive libation up for auction at the synagogue's recent Scotch-tasting evening, a fundraiser that featured a dozen premium single malts for sampling and the counsel of two experts.

The 82-year-old distillation was donated by Father Tucci, who received it as a gift from a wealthy parishioner last year for his 65th birthday. Father Tucci is friendly with Rabbi Jacks and has attended the synagogue and the rabbi's classes. Rabbi Jacks says the Catholic priest asks some of the most perceptive questions – and he knows why.

When he heard the Zichron Kedoshim was holding the Scotch-tasting benefit, Father Tucci gladly offered the gift bottle, not giving much thought to its value.

CJC Aids in Arrest

TORONTO — Court testimony by Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber helped lead to the indictment last week of the self-described "commander" of the American National Socialist Workers Party, the Globe and Mail reported. Bill White, 31, was indicted on seven criminal counts for online threats to Ottawa human rights lawyer Richard Warman, as well as Jews and blacks, partly on the basis of secret testimony by Farber and Warman to a grand jury in Virginia earlier this fall.

Declaration Recalled

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress last week marked the United Nations' passage of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights 60 years ago. "It is no coincidence that the United Nations, itself a creation of the post-World War II international community, passed the Universal Declaration out of the ashes of the Holocaust," said Congress co-president Rabbi Reuven Bulka. "The unprecedented scale of the Nazis' genocidal war crimes... cried out for a global response to protect the rights and freedoms that underpin the world we seek for all humankind."

Cdn. Aid To Mumbai

TORONTO — A team of Israeli trauma experts, supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, is in Mumbai, India, to help victims of the recent terror attacks there. IsraAID, an Israeli humanitarian group, sent a team to share expertise in dealing with disasters and terror attacks. It's helping the Jaslok Hospital and Research Centre's trauma counselling unit in Mumbai to train hospital staff and teachers. It will also directly support families and victims. The federation has also supported IsraAID's work in such places as New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina and in Somali camps in Kenya.

Music Salvager Dies

NEW YORK — Joza Karas, a Czech musician who found and salvaged music composed by Jewish inmates at the Terezin concentration camp, died Dec. 5 at his home in Bloomfield, Conn., at 82, the New York Times reported. In 1985 he published the book Music in Terezin, 1941-1945, which chronicled musical life at the camp in what's now the Czech Republic. The camp had as many as four orchestras, four chamber groups and an opera. Karas salvaged 50 pieces of music from Terezin, which the Nazis used for propaganda.

Circumcision Lawsuit

NEW YORK — A Jewish New Yorker is suing a European organization for saying he wasn't circumcised. John Singer is suing Centropa, a research group focusing on Jewish life and culture, for libel over an interview it published with Singer's mother in which she said neither of her sons was circumcised. Singer says the assertion is false and that its publication on the centre's website has caused "severe embarrassment, mental anguish and extreme emotional distress." The lawsuit, seeks unspecified damages. The suit may hinge on whether Singer can prove his reputation in the Jewish community has been damaged by the statement he wasn't circumcised, the New York Times reported.

British Academic Union Drops Boycott Call

LONDON — Britain's University and College Union dropped its threat of boycotting Israeli academic institutions following legal action by some of its members.

Two Oxford University professors, Michael Yudkin and Denis Noble, threatened to sue their own union over the boycott call. Their lawyers wrote to the union advising that a boycott would contradict its own rules and British law.

During UCU's annual conference in May, the union voted to "disseminate the testimonies" of a UCU delegation to Palestine and to use the testimonies to "promote a wide discussion of the appropriateness of continued educational links with Israeli academic institutions." This was widely interpreted as a call to boycott Israeli universities. The motion also demanded that Ariel College in the West Bank "be investigated under the formal Greylisting Procedure" – a prelude to boycotting the college.

Last week, the union's national executive committee decided not to implement the resolution as planned. The two members who threatened to sue said they'd resume their effort to sue if there were any future attempts to boycott Israeli academic institutions.

A Chanukah Reminder from

Steeles Memorial Chapel

For many of us, Chanukah is a time to recall memories of time spent with family and loved ones.

Unfortunately, some seniors are left with only that ... memories.

If there's an elderly person whom you care for, visit, and light a candle with them. Make sure they're in good health, eating nutritionally and taking medication as prescribed.

It's amazing how a little love and caring can make such a big difference.

Mental health stigma prevents people from seeking help

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Although the Toronto Jewish community places a high value on inclusion and funding initiatives that help maintain a healthy, vibrant community, the stigma associated with mental illness is keeping those in need from getting adequate support, social worker Jack Kugelmass said.

As the former executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services and in other positions, Kugelmass has worked with families that have a relative with mental illness who has been involved in the Jewish community. He said mental illness is not discussed openly within that community.

Special Report
Part 1 of 3

"The fundamental issue, as I see it, is that despite the fact that we live in the 21st century, there is a considerable amount of shame associated with having a relative who has a mental illness and is an adult who lives with his family," Kugelmass said.

"They end up living in a situation of isolation, and very often shame, because sometimes they feel like they are the only ones in this place," he said, adding that his late uncle suffered from a mental illness for most of his adult life.

Kugelmass said the Jewish community doesn't focus enough on ways to include people with mental illness in all aspects of the community.

"That includes everything from involvement in social activities, to even how many synagogues address their needs. Many families are reluctant to bring their families to synagogue because they feel they might be singled out, made to feel uncomfortable. That is very unfortunate, especially in our community that places such a high value on inclusion."

Jack Kugelmass

He added that there is "a lot of ignorance in the community about mental illness. People don't really know what it's all about."

According to the Report on Mental Illness in Canada (2002) – found on the Canadian Mental Heath Association website – mental illness, which can be caused by an interaction of genetic, biological, personality and environmental factors, indirectly affects all Canadians at some time, whether through a family member, a friend or a colleague.

About 20 per cent of Canadians will experience some form of mental illness in their lifetime, and almost half of those who feel they have suffered from depression or anxiety do not consult a doctor about their mental illness.

While this report focused on the general population in Canada rather than the Jewish community specifically, Kugelmass said the statistics would be virtually the same across all ethnic and racial lines.

An article titled "Stigma attached to mental illness a 'national embarrassment,'" released this summer by the Canadian Medical Association (CMA) said that 46 per cent of Canadians think people use mental illness as an excuse for bad behaviour.

"A solid majority of Canadians would not have a family doctor (61 per cent) or hire a lawyer (58 per cent) who has a mental illness [and] 55 per cent would not marry someone who has a mental illness," the article said.

Commenting on the poll, which was part of the CMA's 2008 National Report Card on the state of Canada's health-care system, CMA president Brian Day said,

Hebron coverage focuses on rule of law

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

Clashes between settler radicals and Palestinians in the West Bank city of Hebron escalated earlier this month when Jewish residents refused to leave a disputed building. While media coverage of the events was relatively brief, it was also fair and accurate.

The settlers had been occupying a house since March 2007. They claimed to be tenants of an American Jewish businessman who had purchased the house from the Palestinian owner. The Palestinian denied selling the house.

On Nov. 16, the Israeli Supreme Court ruled that the state has the right to decide whether to evacuate the house while everyone awaits a lower court's ruling on the rightful ownership of the building.

Following the Supreme Court ruling, settlers – mostly youths – protested by damaging the gravestones in a Muslim cemetery, spraying slogans on a mosque, and throwing stones at Israeli soldiers and Palestinians.

But the Israeli government was determined to uphold the law. As Shahar Ilan and Eli Ashkenazi reported in Ha'aretz ("Olmert: Palestinians in Hebron also have rights and a heritage," Dec. 5), at a memorial ceremony for Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said: "When the High Court of Justice ruled that a house in Hebron must be evacuated, it will be evacuated."

Olmert noted: "The desire to leave the mark of the Jewish presence in one of the holiest and most important of our cities is completely understandable. But this desire cannot be stronger than a court decision."

This position was echoed in a Jerusalem Post editorial ("Playing with fire," Dec. 4): "Our overriding opposition is to anarchy and mob rule. Citizens are obligated to respect lawful decisions, such as those of the Supreme Court, even when they vehemently disagree with them."

The Post cautioned against losing sight of two fundamentals. "First, the vast majority of Israelis living in Judea and Samaria are law-abiding patriots. Secondly, in any and all circumstances, Jews must be guaranteed access to the Caves of the Patriarchs. The contemptible behaviour of settler radicals does not negate this right. For long before Christianity and Islam came on the scene, Hebron was already a cornerstone of Jewish civilization."

On Dec. 4, Israeli police moved in quickly and forcibly removed about 150 settlers from the disputed house.

Media reports underscored the fact that Israel acted to enforce the rule of law.

A Reuters story ("Settler standoff stokes vote tension; West Bank patrols," National Post, Dec. 5) quoted Defence Minister Ehud Barak, who gave the evacuation order, as saying: "What was put to the test today was the state's ability to enforce the law and its will on its citizens."

Similarly, in "Settler evictions stir riots," (Toronto Star, Dec. 5), Oakland Ross (who pointed out that those involved in the mayhem are a "minority") quoted Barak as saying: "We will not allow extreme elements to undermine the authority of the state."

In response to the evacuation, gangs of settler youths rampaged, attacking Palestinian property and setting fires. Police and soldiers were slow to respond and, in one case, Israeli journalists covering the story actually went to the aid of a Palestinian family who feared for their safety. In other cases, Palestinians were wounded by gunfire. Two settlers, caught on tape, subsequently turned themselves in to the police.

The North American media largely dropped the story after the violence subsided. But in Israel, Olmert's strong condemnation of the radicals was widely reported. For example, in "PM: Hebron violence a pogrom" (Ynetnews.com, Dec. 7), Roni Sofer quoted Olmert as saying: "As a Jew, I'm ashamed of the sights of Jews firing at Arabs in Hebron. I have no other definition for what we saw but a pogrom. We are the sons of a nation which knows what a pogrom is, and I'm saying this after much thought. I have no other way to put it."

EICHMANN IN JERUSALEM
On Dec. 15, 1961, after a sensational trial in Jerusalem, German war criminal Adolf Eichmann was sentenced to death by hanging. Eichmann, born near Cologne in 1906, joined the Nazi party at age 26. A member of the SS police force, he played an integral role in the murder of European Jews, particularly in Hungary. Captured by the Mossad in Argentina on May 11, 1960, he was flown to Israel to await trial. Found guilty on all counts, he was hanged in Ramleh prison on May 31, 1962.

Federation putting focus on 'working poor'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Despite economic uncertainty, Toronto's Jewish community is not abandoning those who need its help, said David Koschitzky, chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, at the organization's annual general meeting last week.

The federation's annual campaign is approaching $55 million, he said at the meeting, which was held at Beth Tzedec Congregation Dec. 11.

Koschitzky added an assurance that "we are closely watching our own UJA Federation expenses in the interest of financial responsibility."

He said that plans were made for the multi-million dollar construction projects at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan and at the site of the current Bathurst Jewish Community Centre "many years ago, before the economic downturn. By planning during the good times for what our future needs would be, we are in the fortunate position of being able to move ahead even now during the downturn."

The projects are part of the federation's $400-million "Tomorrow" campaign, which is separate from its annual campaign.

The second phase of the Lebovic campus is underway, Cole said. It will include a $110- to $115-million community services complex that will house a Jewish community centre, to be known as the Schwartz Reisman Centre, as well as a day treatment hospital and community offices.

"We hope we'll begin construction in spring 2009 and complete it in 2010," said Stephen Cole, chair of federation's business and finance committee.

One area of increasing focus for the federation is the issue of the working poor, Koschitzky said.

The federation had revenues of $91 million for the year that ended June 30, Cole said. He noted that revenues the previous year were even higher, in part because of an Israel emergency campaign that raised more than $20 million. As well, he added, the federation received a one-time provincial government grant of $15 million.

Cole said, however, that the federation's foundation assets, now at $213 million, declined by $8 million from the previous year, because "the markets were not generous to us.

He added that, "because of market events – the stock market, the bond market – our assets have dropped a further 12 percent to date." However, he noted, the foundation continues to hold "a balanced portfolio," – roughly 52 per cent in equities, 38 per cent in bonds and about 10 per cent in cash.

"We now have $94 million invested in property and equipment," he said.

Keynote speaker Jay Footlik, a Washington, D.C.-based former liaison to the American Jewish community for former U.S. president Bill Clinton and a senior adviser on Middle East and Jewish affairs for the John Kerry campaign in 2004, said that president-elect Barack Obama's priority once he takes office will be getting the American economy "back on track."

As well, Obama will focus on health care and energy issues, said Footlik, a principal in a consulting firm that specializes in homeland security, who spoke about "U.S.-Israel relations under the new administration."

Footlik said that Israelis have been meeting "quite actively" with Obama's team to discuss job creation and a new Israeli initiative to provide electric cars with the goal of making the country energy-independent within 15 to 20 years.

Our lights must shine

In just three days, after early evening absorbs a fading dusk, Jews around the world will light the first candle of Chanukah, chag ha'urim, the festival of lights. As all schoolchildren know, each night for eight successive nights, we will add a candle until at holiday's end, the chanukiyah will be a robust, nine-armed, shining luminescence on the window sills of our homes.

Our children and grandchildren will take great delight in the spinning tops, chocolate coins, songs, sufganiyot and incremental glow of the light of the holiday. But we, their parents and grandparents, will understand another, less playful aspect of the incremental light: that it carries specific historic and theological meaning. They attest to the terrible struggle, but ultimate triumph, of a people who refused to abandon their faith against egomaniacal despotism that's determined to destroy it.

The glowing, candled commemoration of that triumph is itself an act of holiness and a public proclamation that the home in which the candles burn carries the values of the ancient-modern faith that our forebears fought to preserve.

In the deeply troubled times in which we find ourselves today, when entire communities, family, friends and neighbours alike face increasingly uncertain economic futures, we must turn repeatedly to those values and to the faith from which they spring.

Who better than Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, chief rabbi of the United Kingdom, to articulate for us how our faith compels us to respond during times such as these?

In To Heal a Fractured World, he tells us that "serving God and serving our fellow human beings are inseparably linked... Unless the holy leads us outward toward the good, and the good leads us back, for renewal, to the holy, the creative energies of faith run dry."

Now more than ever, according to Rabbi Sacks, social responsibility needs reaffirmation. Not surprisingly, his formula for manifesting such responsibility is quite prosaic, indeed quite "down-to-earth," as he puts it.

In essence, he proposes that we adopt the discourse of everyday kindness: a gentle word, a hand extended, a reassuring touch, a smile, a comforting embrace, an expression of confidence.

"If someone is lonely," he urges, "invite them home. If someone you know has recently been bereaved, visit them and give them comfort. If you know of someone who has lost their job, do all you can to help them find another."

In other words, Rabbi Sacks urges us simply to honour dignity and humanity.

This year in particular, the incremental glow of the candles of Chanukah bears the urgent, important message that we must not be indifferent to the travails and mounting insecurity and suffering of our fellow human beings.

Like the light of the candles that gives the holiday its special meaning, the message of Chanukah too must shine very brightly.

Israel condemned resolutions adopted by the United Nations General Assembly, which, among other things, called for sanctions against the Jewish state and denounced the Israel-U.S. agreement to improve strategic co-operation. Canada supported Israel on three of the resolutions, voted against it on one, and abstained from the other.

A stain on our history

The uprooting of Jews from any place, be it Gaza, Hebron or Spain, will be remembered as a stain on our history ("Showdown in Hebron as settlers evicted," CJN, Dec. 11). We are not talking about a population exchange or a trade of any value, but just a voluntary evacuation that has no precedent in history. The lessons of the retreat from the Gaza enclave of Gush Katif went unnoticed, and no one has accounted for it. And worse, no lesson has been learned. The coming election in Israel will answer these shameful acts.

Israeli leaders espouse suicidal notions

I've perused the Dec. 11 edition of The CJN, and I find that a thoughtful analysis of the distressing situation in Israel is missing. It should have been stated many times over the years that the Israeli leaders who signed the Oslo accords, and their successors who have not repudiated it (supported by organizations such as Peace Now), chose to gamble with the welfare of the residents of the Israel. Israel's president, Shimon Peres, referred to the anticipated increase in the loss of Jewish life as a result of signing these accords as "sacrifices for peace." We all know now that Oslo has failed. The State of Israel gambled with Jewish lives. It continues to do so in the mistaken belief, against its experience of the past 15 years, that peace is attainable with an enemy who kills its own children in an effort to murder ours, an enemy that has never forsworn its objective of eradicating every Jew from Israel.

Let's call it like it is: the State of Israel has encouraged the terrorists by its concessions in exchange for nothing. It has acted, de facto, as an accessory to the acts of terror that have struck Israel and Jews worldwide. I don't understand the mentality of the leaders who espouse suicidal notions.

Israel desires two conflicting objectives

The Palestinian Authority's November advertisements in Israel's leading Hebrew newspapers, detailing the elements of the Arab peace plan that was first adopted by the Arab League in 2002, would not have surprised the prophetic leader of revisionist Zionism, Vladimir Jabotinsky.

One of his greatest insights was his early recognition of the fundamental need of Jews to build an iron wall – an independent military force – to enable Zionist colonization of Palestine. Such military power was necessary, Jabotinsky argued, because Palestinian Arabs, exactly like other proud native people, would not accept becoming a minority in their own land.

Why, Jabotinsky asked, should Jews expect Palestinians to behave any differently from all the other native peoples who had violently resisted colonization? As Jabotinsky once said, Palestinian Arabs "look upon Palestine with the same instinctive love and true fervour that any Aztec looked upon his Mexico or any Sioux looked upon his prairie."

Yet, Jabotinsky's related great insight was that once the Arabs recognized that they cannot "get rid of us," influence would swing from Arab extremists to Arab moderates. And then, reasonable compromises could be negotiated over practical issues such as national autonomy.

Israel desires two conflicting objectives: peace and significant areas of the occupied territories. Yet, unless it is willing to compromise on the latter, it cannot have the former. It does not require the insight of a Jabotinsky to know that compromise is long overdue.

Extremists are today's evildoers

I hope that Sally Zerker's hard-hitting op-ed article against all things politically left was referring to the extreme left ("The wrong-headedness of the left," CJN Perspectives, Nov. 27). I doubt the charges contained therein could be valid against the likes of former New Democratic Party leader Ed Broadbent, former British prime minister Tony Blair or Israeli President Shimon Peres. If so, while there was a great deal of truth in her story, there was a sense of viciousness about it and a failure to look in other directions.

Political and religious extremes are the evil ones. The leftist Stalin was little different than the rightist Hitler, with the exception of how they perpetrated their crimes and against whom. Today's great evildoers, however, are more often religious extremists, most obviously and frequently Islamists who perpetrate violence and terror against all opponents. Think Iran here, among others. That is a far greater concern than those leftists and rightists who have a knee-jerk reaction to oppose Israel.

Indeed, and very sadly, a few of these religious extremists are Jews. Fortunately, they are a small minority, but many of them are a major barrier to peace between Israel and its neighbours, and commit criminal acts against them.

Settler violence stokes fears of renewed intifadah

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Concerned by settler violence against Palestinians and Israeli soldiers, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has ordered Israeli security forces to apply a zero-tolerance policy toward extremist settlers.

Olmert and the country's top security officials fear that unchecked settler violence could spark a new Palestinian intifadah, enrage the Muslim world and compromise Israel's international standing.

They are worried as well about a potential spillover into Israel proper, where extremist settlers could target prominent left-wingers or even national leaders. A little more than two months ago, a prominent left-wing professor and Israel Prize winner, Prof. Zeev Sternhell, was wounded by a pipe bomb planted outside his home.

The latest settler rampage came earlier this month after Israeli police evacuated settlers from a building in Hebron. Jewish settlers had moved into the building in March 2007 after an American Jewish businessman claimed to have bought it for them, but the Palestinian owner denied selling it.

Israel's Supreme Court ruled last month that the building should be evacuated until the ownership issue was decided. On Dec. 4, in a well-planned operation, special police forces surprised the estimated 200 inhabitants, dragging them out in less than an hour.

The eviction triggered a paroxysm of settler violence against Palestinians in nearby neighbourhoods. Settlers set fire to courtyards and olive trees, stoned vehicles and passers-by, and terrorized Palestinian residents. In one case, a settler was filmed firing live ammunition from close range and wounding at least two Palestinian men. Settlers also destroyed headstones in a Muslim cemetery and spray-painted slurs on mosque walls.

Meanwhile, in front of the disputed Hebron building, they recited prayers against the government, the army and the police.

In a Dec. 7 cabinet meeting, Olmert did not mince words.

"The sight of Jews firing at innocent Palestinians has no other name than a 'pogrom,'" he declared. "I am ashamed that Jews could do such a thing. I have asked the defence minister and other relevant individuals to do all it takes and to use whatever force they need in any place under Israeli control to stop these outrages."

The violent settler response to the evacuation of the building, dubbed the House of Contention by Israeli media and called the Peace House by settlers, was symptomatic of a relatively new phenomenon: growing numbers of radical settlers who feel alienated from the state, don't accept its authority and are ready to use violence to prevent it from taking action against settler interests.

The eruption of violence in Hebron was not a case of spontaneous anger, but part of a calculated strategy that radical settlers call "price tag." The policy is intended to demonstrate to Israel that it will have to pay a very high price for any action the government takes against them in the hope that Israel eventually will get the message and desist.

This way, the settlers believe, they will prevent the Jewish settlements in the West Bank from suffering the same fate as those in the Gaza Strip, which were evacuated, destroyed and handed over to the Palestinians in the summer of 2005.

Two seminal events inform this radical thinking: the 2005 "disengagement" and the destruction of illegal settler homes at the West Bank outpost of Amona in February 2006. Radical elements among the settlers attribute these setbacks to insufficient settler resistance to the government, hence the new "price tag" policy.

Radical settlers also are telling their followers that in working against the settler movement, successive Israeli governments have acted against Jewish principles, tikkun olam and the messianic era – and, therefore, are illegitimate. Some settlers consequently have disavowed their allegiance to the State of Israel, refusing to serve in the army and backing the establishment of a rival breakaway Kingdom of Judea based on Torah and Jewish law.

The extremist fringe is estimated at between several hundred to a few thousand out of the West Bank's 300,000 settlers. Most of the settlers' leadership, including the Judea and Samaria Council, disavow the radicals. Dani Dayan, the council chairman, says they are doing the settler enterprise more harm than good. Others, however, have spoken out in defence of the radical settler youth.

This year has seen approximately 700 cases of settler violence against Palestinians and Israeli soldiers. More than 500 criminal complaints have been filed and more than 200 people have been arrested.

The Shin Bet internal security service, which monitors radical Jewish activities in the West Bank, warns that extremists are ready to use live fire to stop peacemaking with the Palestinians.

There is deep concern that this sort of settler action could spark a new Palestinian intifadah. Indeed, Palestinian leaders have warned that if settler violence continues, acts of revenge are almost a certainty. This could spiral out of control quickly.

Some fear that if the Israeli army becomes involved against Palestinian lawbreakers, Palestinian police – who have won kudos from Israel recently for the way they are keeping the peace – might turn their weapons on Israeli forces, sinking the peacekeeping framework their American sponsors have so assiduously helped to build.

There is fear, too, that footage of Jewish graffiti on mosques and desecration of Muslim cemeteries will ignite the Muslim world the way that the caricatures of Muhammad published in the Danish press did in 2005.

Already the settler violence has sparked severe European criticism of the radicals and of Israel's inability to contain them. If not addressed, it could severely undermine Israel's international standing.

As for the spillover of violence into Israel proper, the September attack outside Sternhell's home in Jerusalem almost certainly was perpetrated by radical right-wingers. Pamphlets at the site of the bombing referred to the Kingdom of Judea and offered a $275,000 reward to anyone who kills a dovish leader.

After the evacuation of the house in Hebron, radical settlers blocked roads into Israel proper. On Dec. 8, small groups of settlers demonstrated outside the homes of the commander of the Israeli army's Judea and Samaria division, the deputy state attorney and the head of the Shin Bet's Jewish desk, broadcasting a threatening message.

"In the same way as we were surprised in Hebron, we can surprise the law enforcers and get to their homes," they warned.

Olmert and Defence Minister Ehud Barak are taking the threat posed by the radicals very seriously. The army has been given instructions to clamp down strongly on any hint of violence, and the Shin Bet's Jewish desk is stepping up its already intensive monitoring of radical groups.

Although the radicals have nothing like the wide base of tacit support they had when Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated by a right-wing extremist in 1995, the lesson of the past few months is that without concerted action by Israel's forces of law and order, these radical settlers will be very difficult to stop.

Say no to the haredim!

The money the Jewish Agency receives from the Diaspora doesn't come from haredim. They support their own institutions, not communal campaigns, although they benefit from Jewish Agency handouts.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

However, if donors want to settle in Israel, their Jewish status may turn out to be unacceptable to the haredim.

Their rabbis dominate Israeli religious life in general, and matters of Jewish status in particular. Thus a highly respected Orthodox rabbi, Haim Druckman, who visited Canada recently, has been removed as head of Israel's National Conversion Court for being "too lenient." Ruthless rigidity often masquerades as pious authenticity.

The demand to reinstate him is behind the recent resolution by the Jewish Agency urging the government of Israel to establish an independent authority "to allow the conversion process to move forward." Although many agency delegates wanted an explicit call for the acceptance of converts from all streams of Judaism, pragmatists hoped that this timid request may have some chance of success.

It's a vain hope, because after Israeli elections next February, Benjamin Netanyahu is likely to form the government by giving more concessions to the haredim. Tzipi Livni has vowed that her party won't sell Israel to the haredim and refuses "to pawn Israel's future for the prime minister's chair." There's even an attempt to form yet another political party to enable liberals to have their own voice in the next Knesset.

The haredi presence also interferes with the Diaspora. At a recent meeting of Orthodox rabbis in Europe, several spiritual leaders of small communities pleaded for greater latitude in accepting converts. Without such openness, these communities cannot survive, the meeting was told. But the large presence of Israeli haredi rabbis prevented a softening of the Orthodox position.

Those who proposed the Jewish Agency resolution didn't have Europe in mind. They were thinking of some 300,000 Israelis who came to the country under the Law of Return, but whose Jewish status is unacceptable to the rabbis in power. A more moderate conversion authority would give them the legitimacy they deserve.

The ironies must not escape us. Non-Orthodox Jews may be good for giving money, but not necessarily for being regarded as Jews. The revival of Jewish life in Europe is apparently only for those who wear black hats and sheitels. And a substantial portion of Israel's citizens are being denied their rightful place in Israeli society.

I've no problem with haredim who set standards for themselves and each other, however warped I may consider them to be. My issue is with the vast majority of ostensibly reasonable Jews around the world who put up with it in the name of pragmatism and unity. It's time to say no to intransigence – and act on it!

Honouring two Jewish heroes

On Nov. 26, the world mourned as terrorists struck Mumbai, India. As the death count continued to rise, more tragic stories were brought to light. One such story was that of Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg and his wife, Rivkah.

Justin Dahan in Ottawa

The couple had moved to India to spread Chabad's message. They left the comforts of their homes in western society to take a post in India, where they provided a safe haven for Jewish people. On that tragic day, a house normally filled with joy became the birthplace of tragedy. The Chabad house was taken captive, and the people inside became hostages. Gavriel and Rivkah were among those murdered. Of their family, only their son, Moshe, survived the attack, after a cook grabbed the two-year-old and carried him to safety as soon as the attack started.

This incident garnered international media attention, and the story of Gavriel and Rivkah became a tragedy shared by the whole Jewish world.

Chabad Ottawa held a ceremony for the victims of the Mumbai terror attack at Ottawa's Soloway Jewish Community Centre. Jews of all ages, regardless of level of observance, came together to mourn this tragedy.

Rabbi Chaim Boyarsky, the Chabad rabbi in Ottawa, spoke about his colleagues, "I knew Gavriel personally. He was an incredible person. I will try to emulate his pure devotion and genuine dedication to his mission. The terrorists may have broken us, but we are going to fight back, not with guns, but with light and love."

The Mumbai attacks truly illustrate the Jewish way of thinking. The sacrifices that Rabbi Gavriel and Rivkah Holtzberg made inspired the people around them. The Chabad house was a place where all Jews could gather, rest and relax. Despite being in an area surrounded by turmoil, the house always remained peaceful.

When the sanctity of the Chabad house was violated, Rabbi Boyarsky said, it was "the hardest few days of my life."

He added: "We are broken, but we are not crushed. We are going to double and triple our efforts here at Chabad in Ottawa to reach every Jewish student and make sure we have an open home for anyone, any time."

Chabad in Ottawa continued to honour the memories of Gavriel and Rivkah with a memorial Shabbat dinner. An e-mail about the event that was sent out to Jewish students said that in order "to honour our dear fellow Jews whose lives were cut short, we must fill that void, not with moments of silence or cries of vengeance, rather with the sounds of joy and celebration that were typically heard at Rabbi Gabi and Rivkie's Chabad House."

Through events like that memorial Shabbat, the memory of these two Jewish heroes lives on.

Jewish people have a strong history of unity. It's been said time and again that Jews stick together. This is something that sets the Jewish People apart. On the eve of terror, nothing can break us apart. Negative events only draw the Jewish people further together.

Rabbi Boyarsky put it best when he said, "Now is the time to fight – not with doubt and questions, but with the innocent faith of my child, with unity and love toward one another, and with as many rational and irrational good deeds that we can muster."

Preaching a message of peace in a time of turmoil is paramount for Ottawa's Chabad Student Network. While others crumble, it's important for us to maintain our decency. Rabbi Boyarsky and Chabad continue to keep the Jewish faith alive by preaching awareness and unity, not revenge.

A place for Chanukah

The Christmas season is a strange time of year for Jews. Sure, it gets easier as you get older, but long after you leave behind thoughts of presents under a tree, reindeer hooves in snow and a workshop at the North Pole, a lingering disconnect remains.

Jesse Mintz in Halifax

It's tangible. I can't quite put my finger on it, but I know, as many of you undoubtedly do, too, that it's there. Maybe it's the years of seeing Christmas films or being wished "Merry Christmas," by passersby on the street. Maybe it's hearing Christmas music in grocery stores starting in October or seeing lights and decorations wherever you look.

Whatever it is, I can't help but feel like every time I here some guy in a Santa suit say "Ho, ho, ho!" and jiggle his belly, he's laughing at a joke that I'm not privy to.

The question, really, is how are Jews supposed to carve out a place for Chanukah at this time of year, and I'm not sure I have an answer to that question.

In all honesty, I love Christmas. I love that for one month in the year, people don't need a reason to be happy or nice or pleasant. They just are. It may be for the wrong reasons – don't worry, I'll spare you the political rant or social commentary – but at least it's a start.

And I love that people find comfort in their traditions. Everyone has a story of how they do Christmas in their home – they pick out the tree with their dad and chop it down themselves, or the youngest kids get to decorate the stockings, or there's the tried and tested milk and cookies for Santa at midnight.

This year, without even knowing it, I created a Chanukah tradition of my own to go along with everyone else's Christmas rituals.

At my school – which is, admittedly, an odd and traditional institution – every year, students, faculty and members of the community gather for a night called "Frivols." It's an annual King's tradition in which students, teachers and people from the community get together over warm apple cider, gingerbread and shortbread cookies to read Christmas stories.

I decided to go this year, for the Christmas stories almost as much as for the free cookies. In front of a fireplace in a room whose aroma of pine, gingerbread and crisp December air made it smell the way only Christmas can, we sat intently as one person after another stood up and read stories they had practised for the occasion.

Some people read traditional Christmas stories. Some people read not-so-traditional stories. We heard about the Gift of the Magi and the Night Before Christmas in the same evening as we heard about one person's experience working as an elf in a Macy's department store.

The stories were prepared beforehand and were read quite well. When all the stories had been told, when all the cider had been drunk and the cookies were all but gone, the person organizing the event asked if anyone else had any other stories that they wanted to share.

I did, in fact, have something to share.

So I stood up and brushed the cookie crumbs from my sweater and introduced myself. Then I told the story of Chanukah.

Granted, I was speaking to a room half full of Jewish students from Toronto who undoubtedly knew the story as well as I do. And granted, I wasn't nearly as eloquent, warm or emotive as the people who had practised in front of a mirror for days in advance. And yes, I admit, I may have mixed up some of the names of the Maccabees with the names of Jacob's children – but really, how many of you know anyone besides Judah?

But still. In a room with a Christmas tree next to a roaring fire and in front of a table with milk and cookies laid out for jolly old St. Nick, I found a place for the story of Chanukah.

FAST FOR HUNGER

Federation body aims to integrate Israelis

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

There is much excitement, enthusiasm and optimism coming from the new leadership at the Israeli Forum, says Ehud Telem, the organization's vice-chair.

"There is new energy, new drive and new ideas," he added.

The forum, which was formed three years ago and is supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, works to reach out to the growing Israeli community in Toronto that is largely unaffiliated and disconnected from the rest of the Jewish community, said Telem, president and CEO of Peerless Travel.

But he hopes that new leadership – headed by Mark Gold, who replaced Gil Blutrich as chairman – along with volunteers, committees and initiatives, will help the Israeli community become more established in Toronto.

Telem, along with fellow vice-chair Danny Baratz, have attended meetings to establish committees and set four main goals on which the forum is based.

He said the first goal was established when the forum was founded in 2005.

"We're still working on what's called the Hamifgash program, which is covering the cultural aspects, events, and things of that nature," Telem said.

The second part of the four-pronged approach is what Telem believes is the most important.

"Education is what brought me into this thing. The Israeli population in Toronto is now about 25 per cent of the Jewish population… It is not, for the most part, affiliated with the established Jewish community, and the parents may not realize that when you live in the Diaspora and you want to save your Jewish identity, you have to give your kids a Jewish education," he said.

Three years ago, the forum founded Kachol Lavan, an Israeli supplementary school that serves about 180 students, but Telem wants to see more efforts to provide Jewish education for Israeli children in Toronto.

"Israelis are not going to Jewish schools as much as Canadians from the established Jewish community are going. There are many reasons," Telem said.

"A lot of Israelis are secular, so what they are looking for is a replica of what they had [in Israel]… I would say that the number 1 excuse is that they can't afford it. If they could afford it, or if it was subsidized enough, they would find ways."

Telem said he worries that the secular background of Israeli immigrants coupled with public education will lead them to assimilate much more quickly than the rest of the Jewish community.

"It is a challenge, mostly because the Israelis that arrive here are not ready to think about these problems. What do they think about? They're immigrants. They think about getting a house, getting a job… since education is free in this country, it is very easy to go to public school, register the kids and forget about this issue for the time being," he said.

"That's why there is an urgency in resolving it. It requires a lot of funding and so far, we don't know where this funding is going to come from. It is an amazing challenge for the community. It is not only a challenge for the Israeli community. The Jewish community wants to save those kids from disappearing in one generation."

That's why the forum's third goal is fundraising, and adding to its donor list of 500 people.

"If you were born here, you were taught from day one to donate, to give, to volunteer – to do something for the community," he said.

But, he added, many of the Israelis who immigrated to Toronto more than five years ago weren't exposed to a culture of philanthropy.

"In Israel, it has improved, but many of the Israelis who are living in Toronto now came before that change occurred," Telem said.

"In order to take care of your needs, you have to donate some of your income to the Jewish community. You have to invest in the Jewish community."

The fourth goal for forum volunteers is to bridge the cultural and social gaps between Israeli immigrants and the Canadian Jewish community.

"There are tremendous gaps and lots of grievances on both sides. There are all kinds of things that separate the two communities," he said.

A special committee dedicated to this issue has been formed to create opportunities for members of both communities to connect.

"I think there should be discussion groups… composed of Israelis and Canadians to discuss the different issues...That will allow both communities to be aware of what's going on, and that there is a problem."

ASSOCIATED HEBREW SCHOOLS

Thanks A Hundred

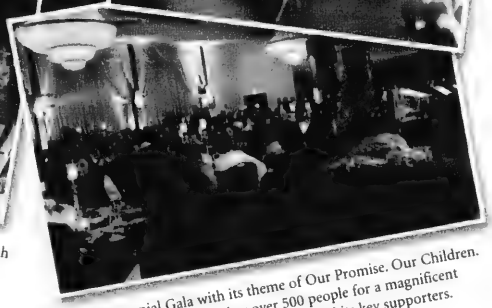
Associated's Centennial was truly a once in a lifetime celebration that was made possible through the efforts of hundreds of individuals. Thank you to all the volunteers, community members, donors, parents, students, faculty and staff who were a part of this special year. Together, we celebrated in true Associated style – by reaffirming our bond with the State of Israel, by rejoicing side-by-side with the community, by avowing the centrality of Torah values, by honouring those individuals that brought us to this milestone and by guaranteeing that excellence and innovation would be an essential part of our future.

Through the Centennial Endowment Fund, dozens of visionary donors have become partners in ensuring a great future for Associated.

The Associated Centennial Forest, which is located within the Shahariya Forest near Kiryat Gar, was inaugurated and will be Associated's living link to Israel.

The Associated Centennial Sefer Torah – A Torah for the Generations – garnered the support of hundreds of families as it was dedicated and brought to its new home at Associated.

The community joined the Associated family at our Centennial Birthday Bash, a spectacular celebration replete with food, fun, music and activity.



The Centennial Gala with its theme of Our Promise. Our Children. Our Future brought together over 500 people for a magnificent evening that paid tribute to Associated and its key supporters.

OUR PROMISE. OUR CHILDREN. OUR FUTURE.
CELEBRATING 100 YEARS OF ASSOCIATED

This beautiful and informative book chronicles the history of Associated in words and pictures and interweaves it with the history of Canada, Israel and the World.

This is a must-have keepsake for for students, alumni, parents and anyone interested in Associated or Jewish Toronto. It's also a great gift idea for Chanukah and other occasions. Books are $54 and can be purchased by calling Relia at 416-494-7666, ext. 261.

A Great School

Guest Voice

Artist's chanukiyah is a tribute to his dad

By DANIEL KEREM
Special to The CJN

"Tradition, tradition," the words of Tevye the milkman, immortalized in the play Fiddler on the Roof, were carried far beyond the play's initial Jewish viewers.

They have been warmly received by international audiences around the globe. In Japan, the play was met with unprecedented popularity, and when someone asked, "Why," the reply was, "It's so Japanese." Such it seems is the commonality of our human experience and perhaps also of Jewish experience.

But Tevye seems unaware that traditions, however old, began somewhere and were often initiated by people just like him, or for that matter, like you and me.

Two months after the death of my father, Max Rosenfeld Kerem, I decided to make something for his aliyat neshamah (the raising of his soul), which would then serve as a memorial to him. From Max's early adulthood as a journalist and teacher, to his career as a diplomat and statesman, it was his love and devotion to Am Yisrael that defined his existence.

In addition to his international career, Max was also involved in domestic political and municipal affairs in and around Jerusalem. For two terms of office, he served as mayor of the village of Ein Kerem, and he was the only person in the village to be addressed as mar (mister). But because he was so personable and so involved in village life, he was addressed not as Mar Rosenfeld nor as Mar Kerem, but rather as Mar Max.

Indeed, some of my earliest childhood memories are of wandering through the small Yemenite synagogues during the High Holidays, where my father was treated as the guest of honour – not because he was mayor, but for his assistance and the positive changes he had effected in these people's lives.

As a diplomat and statesman, Max's career began when he was recruited as translator and chargé d'affaires for the queen of Belgium, on her historic visit to Jerusalem. While he was engaged in this capacity, it was then-prime minister Golda Meir who noted his abilities, his facility with languages and personal charm, and persuaded him to join the Israeli Foreign Office.

Max's initial years in the Foreign Office were spent as personal secretary and assistant to Meir, and it was during this period that he served as translator and guide to the king of Nepal on his historic visit to Israel.

Although Max was a formal person, his success as a diplomat was due more to his humanity and charm, and the fact that he never forgot his humble origins – he was the son of destitute Galician refugees – and was able to relate equally to both commoners and kings.

Because my father was a diplomat for the State of Israel, the memorial had to be emblematic and instantly recognizable as reflecting both personal and cultural aspirations. I quickly settled on the idea of a large chanukiyah, as the menorah has been the emblem of the Jewish people for more than 2,000 years and is the symbol of the State of Israel. Also, I had made a chanukiyah as a memorial to my mother, and therefore it seemed appropriate to continue in this and thereby inaugurate a tradition.

The chanukiyah I made, 51 inches in height, in the transitional Spanish style of the early 16th century, combines elements of the Gothic and Renaissance styles. Its design is an integration of several illuminations of the menorah in medieval Spanish- Hebrew manuscripts and of methods and techniques used in Spain.

Approximately 30 Spanish Tanach manuscripts, depicting the menorah survive, the earliest dating to the 13th century and the latest to the last decade of the 15th century, just before the expulsion of 1492. These illustrations of the menorah are largely based on the commentaries of Rashi (1040-1105) on the Torah, and of Rambam (1138-1204) on the Mishnah and the Talmud, and in his own book, Mishnah Torah.

The chanukiyah I constructed integrates the "old" with the "new," though in a curious reversal of history, the new – or newer Renaissance element is approximately 400 years old. It is a baluster of wrought iron forged and carved in Avila or Salamanca toward the end of the 16th century, which was then probably part of a chapel grill.

Onto the broken baluster I welded a tapered extension (a one-inch round bar) that holds the eight arms and terminates in the shamash, the chanukiyah's central light.

Following biblical tradition, and because my father was an avid gardener, the chanukiyah incorporates botanical elements. Open flowers are beneath the candle cups, which are supported by fruits resembling pomegranates. The baluster incorporates two carved lilies and the cusping terminates in three trilliums.

Although most of my father's time was spent in government council chambers and embassy offices, and toward the end of his career, as envoy to the United Nations, his real gift was to enable people to expand their imaginations and transmit to them that their life forces, enthusiasm and devotion could manifest themselves in anything – in my case even in bars of seemingly inert and cold iron.

He was even more delighted to learn that the proceeds would be shared with Congregation Shomrim Laboker, which he has also visited and with whose rabbi, Yonah Rosner, he is also acquainted.

It was a generous act in the "spirit" of the season, for sure. But Father Tucci's connection with the Jewish community goes deeper than interfaith dialogue.

As he told The CJN, his mother was Jewish and his father, a Roman Catholic, was of Italian descent. The future Father Tucci was brought up in New York in both faiths and, in fact, had a bar mitzvah. His Jewish name is Yankel. Today, he prefers to be called Victor.

He grew up and became a priest, has served most of his vocation in Montreal, and worked for many years with the public school boards as a spiritual animator, taking thousands of kids on synagogue tours.

He really hit it off with Rabbi Jacks, an affable Lubavitcher from a secular family in South Africa, who has lived here for "15 winters."

Neither really knew what the value of the 1926 Scotch was. Father Tucci had written to Dewar's in Scotland, but he didn't received a reply. The original price tag still attached was $5.

After surfing eBay and consulting young Scotch experts, who went by the names of Jason and Josie, it was decided to open bids at $1,500.

Volunteer auctioneer Ross Paperman, an undertaker by day, joked, "You can get a bigger box at my office for the same price."

When no one offered to put up that much, Paperman decided to auction off the bottle collectively. About a dozen people chipped in various amounts, and Paperman sounded his imaginary gavel when bids stalled at $2,700.

What to do when there are so many new owners? The spirit of generosity continued, and they decided to open the bottle right then and there and let everyone present have a wee dram.

If there was any concern about its quality, it was dispelled after the first brave soul in line pronounced the liquid gold "smooth as silk."

Fortunately, no one had heard that another bottle of 1926 Scotch had gone for $54,000 (US) in a Christie's auction in New York a year ago. The priest and rabbi can console themselves in the knowledge that it was a single-malt Macallan, the choice of connoisseurs, and a Dewar's is a more down-to-earth, blended whisky.

The Scotch-tasting evening, which also included comedy by Joey Elias was the first collaboration between Zichron Kedoshim and Shomrim Laboker, two Orthodox synagogues at the opposite ends of Westbury Avenue, but not the last, their rabbis agree.

Both congregations have known better times, when Snowdon was home to a large Jewish community, and are trying a variety of imaginative programming to get people back. Pooling their resources just makes sense, they say.

Rabbi Jacks, who is marking his 10th Chanukah at Zichron Kedoshim, says the effort is starting to pay off and his synagogue is enjoying a modest revival.

It has been decided to make Scotch tasting an annual event. As Paperman said, it's all right to "get shikker in the name of tzedakah."

Both congregations have a reputation for the quality and quantity of schnapps quaffed at their Shabbat kiddushes and after morning prayers.

Rabbi Jacks, a pretty good standup comedian himself, explained that raising a glass in l'chaim is an important part of Jewish tradition and alcohol can be found at many ceremonies.

"My father always said that one of the reasons for the very low rate of alcoholism among Jews is that we do not drink in the closet. Drinking is out in the open, and not hidden or shameful."

Drunkenness to the point of impairment of judgment is proscribed, however, he added. Alcohol should be used in moderation and, being highly responsible drinkers, guests offered lifts at the end of the evening for anyone in need.

Rabbi Jacks told the story of the rabbi who missed observing his father's yahrzeit. The deceased's spectre visited him in a dream, saying he could forgive his son for not reciting Kaddish or leading special services in shul or undertaking new studies, but not for missing "saying a l'chaim in my honour. His soul could not rest easily."

Consulate's neighbour loses suit for greater security

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — A Quebec judge has thrown out a lawsuit against the State of Israel and the owners of Montreal's Westmount Square by tenants of an office near the Israeli consulate in that building.

Lawyer Robert Teitelbaum says he is going to appeal Superior Court Justice Guy Cournoyer's dismissal of his and notary Solomon Katz's case that they, as well as their staff and clients, are entitled to personal security under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, as well as the terms of their lease.

Their sixth-floor office is directly across the hall from the Israeli consulate, which moved into Westmount Square last summer after being located in the downtown CIBC building since 1986.

Teitelbaum and Katz say they would be at risk if the consulate were ever attacked, and they want upgraded security measures, such as dedicating one of the building's six elevators to the sixth floor, as well as security cameras in that elevator, and a security guard with a metal detector on the ground floor to screen people entering the élevator.

The case received prominent coverage in a recent edition of the Lawyers Weekly, a newspaper for the Canadian legal profession.

Teitelbaum noted that the walls around the entrance area of the consulate were heavily reinforced. They say their office would be in the line of fire if the consulate's security personnel retaliated against any attack.

He said his letters to the landlord for enhanced security went unanswered.

Teitelbaum and Katz told the court that, by locating in an officer tower rather than a freestanding building, the consulate is effectively using them as "human shields" to add another line of defence in a possible attack.

Cournoyer rejected their constitutional challenge, citing the federal State Immunity Act, which exempts foreign states from the jurisdiction of Canadian courts, except when death, bodily injury or damage to, or loss of, property are involved.

"Respecting a principle of international law may not be considered to be a violation of the principle of fundamental justice under [section] 7" of the Charter, he wrote.

Teitelbaum said he doesn't want to wait until any harm is done to sue for protection.

The consulate's lawyer, Barry Landy, said that it "would set a serious precedent if not only Israel, but any consulate, was obliged to start installing security measures for its neighbours."

In "Reeling in musicians gone adrift" (CJN, Dec. 4), the Resa's Pieces Concert Band's longtime affiliation with the Koffler Centre of the Arts was not mentioned. After seven years under the Koffler umbrella, the band became an independent organization this fall. The CJN regrets the omission.

UJA Campaign 2009 receives a helping hand from creative students

CHAT's UJA Week contributes to campaign total of $55 million

By Daniel Horowitz

During the first week of December, Vaughan's TanenbaumCHAT was home to a number of loonies running wild through its halls. Fortunately, the chaos happening inside the Kimel Family Education Centre on the Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus was all for a good cause.

It was part of CHAT's UJA Week, which saw students and staff pitch in to raise money for United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2009, chaired by Fran Sonshine and Henry Wolfond.

The campaign is currently on pace with last year's despite the current economic climate, and stands at $55 million. Organized by CHAT students Arielle Goldfarb, Jaime Greenspan and Alana Streisfield, UJA Week raised more than $1,500 from a variety of unique and fun money-making initiatives.

"Every morning, lunch and afternoon we sold blue and white sprinkled donuts which went like crazy," enthused Striesfield. "Throughout the week we had different activities running including Shabbat-o-grams, themed lunches which included an Israeli dance party, an Israeli shuk, and a raffle with great prizes like Raptors tickets, and ipods supplied by UJA."

As for those loonies roaming the halls, fortunately they were part of "loonie for a loony", an initiative which saw strangely dressed students run around holding baskets, collecting spare change.

"The Grade 12 auction was our most successful event of the week," said Goldfarb. "Students from all grades were able to 'purchase' different grade 12 students to hang out with for a week. The students really enjoyed this, so much so that the highest bid was $250."

"The opportunity for me to be presented with a cheque for Campaign 2009 from the young people at CHAT was one of the highlights of my term as campaign chair," said Sonshine. "The organizers did an amazing job of rallying support from the student body in a fun and creative way. At the same time, these hard working and enthusiastic kids brought home the message to their peers that TanenbaumCHAT is part of a larger community and that they too, should feel a responsibility to help others. We can all feel great pride in our youngsters and know that the future of our community is in good hands."

"Our goal was really to raise awareness of UJA within the school, and have full participation from the students, which we achieved," said a proud Greenspan. "All students and staff appreciate all that UJA has contributed to our education including our new, beautiful building, and we feel that participating in UJA activities is a way in which we can thank UJA while giving back to the community through its annual campaign."

Campaign 2009 officially closes on February 10 with a community event at Toronto's Inn on the Park. For more information, or for tickets to the closing celebration, call Michelle Golfman at 416.631.5854 or email her at mgolfman@ujafed.org

Mercaz Professional Development Day benefits Zareinu

Dr. Mitchell Parker, principal of Toronto's Zareinu Educational Centre, was looking for a tailor made mentoring program, reflecting the school's unique needs. He found it at UJA Federation's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (Mercaz).

Zareinu is a Jewish day school and treatment centre, which provides special education and individualized therapies to children with a wide range of physical and developmental challenges.

As part of a recent Professional Development Day held by the Mercaz, 50 Zareinu staff members – comprised of teachers, occupational therapists, speech therapists, music therapists and physiotherapists - made their way to the school for a special Sunday evening presentation made by Dr. Patrick Schwarz, Professor of Special Education, and chair of the Diversity in Learning & Development Department at the National-Louis University in Chicago.

"On one hand, Dr. Schwarz provided information that had a sound theory behind it, but he also managed to present it in an interactive and engaging way," said Parker. "Everybody who attended thought it was a very useful and enlightening evening. Remember, Zareinu has teams of teachers who work together, every day from 8:30 a.m. to 4:00 p.m., so it's very much like a family. And, like family, it's important that they all get along. That's what Schwarz talked about – working as a team – and that's probably what we're most proud of at Zareinu, our ability to work together for the benefit of our students."

Dr. Schwarz's presentation was made possible through the generosity of Henry Wolfond, chair, along with Fran Sonshine, of United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2009.

"As the parent of an autistic child, we want to ensure that his future will provide him with every opportunity to realize his potential for himself and for society," explained Wolfond. "We feel inclusion for those with disabilities is an imperative for our community and a fundamental civil right."

Spearheading the Schwarz initiative was Estee Klar-Wolfond, an active participant with the Mercaz and one of the organizers of the upcoming UJA Federation Inclusion Action Week.

Zareinu preschoolers with their classroom staff, occupational and physiotherapists.

"Inclusion is a universal goal," says Klar-Wolfond. "What we learn by universal design, which is what Schwarz talks about, is how simple accommodation for different learners can be. For instance, if a student responds visually and learns that way, what can we do to accommodate that? It's a very functional and useful method of enabling responses and learning for students who do not learn typically."

"Mercaz is shifting from its traditional way of providing educational services to a new initiative known as Quality Review and Enhancement," explains Silvia Eilath, Mercaz educational consultant and PD Day coordinator. "Overall objectives of the QRE are to enhance the quality of education in our schools and programs, to establish a reliable mechanism of ongoing school improvement, to enable all students to reach their highest learning potential and to enhance communication and resource sharing among Jewish day schools and supplementary programs."

Jewish and Indo-Canadian communities hold anti-terrorism rally

UJA Federation joins Canada India Foundation to organize event

Close to 2,000 people made their way to Mississauga's International Centre on Sunday, December 7 to pay tribute to the 174 people killed in the recent terrorist attacks in Mumbai, and to express a strong anti-terrorism message, in solidarity with the people of Mumbai.

Standing Together with India; Remembering Mumbai's Victims was organized by The Canada India Foundation and the Indo-Canada Chamber of Commerce with the support of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region and the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC).

Over 50 multi-ethnic and cultural organizations co-sponsored the event which included a candle-lighting ceremony, non-denominational prayers, and several speeches.

The Honourable Jason Kenney, federal Minister of Citizenship, Immigration, and Multiculturalism, brought greetings from Prime Minister Stephen Harper while The Honourable Ujjal Dosanjh, MP and the former Premier of British Columbia, also delivered an address.

"Close to 2,000 people from various ethnic backgrounds gave up their Sunday to come together to express their outrage with this senseless act of violence that took so many innocent lives," said UJA Federation Board Chair David Koschitzky. "We, as Jews, know all too well how horrific terrorism – in all its forms – is, and it was inspirational to see people from all the major faiths gathering with one purpose, to stand together as one against terrorism, and to say we must stop it."

"The many bonds among the Indo-Canadian and Jewish communities, and the common values we share, have long made us natural partners in building a better world," explained Hershell Ezrin, CEO, CIJA. "The Mumbai tragedy served to bring us closer together as we shared our pain and our united vision that extremists must never be allowed to gain the upper hand in our quest for freedom, tolerance and mutual respect. From the senseless horrors of Mumbai both communities pledged a closer working relationship for our children's sake and benefit."

Adenauer painting returned to Stern estate

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The recovery of a Nazi-looted painting once in the possession of former German chancellor Konrad Adenauer was announced by the estate of the late German-born Montreal art dealer Max Stern at a press conference last week in Berlin.

Flight Into Egypt by the circle of Flemish Old Master Jan Wellens de Cock (1480-1527) was among the approximately 400 works that Stern, then a gallery owner in Düsseldorf, was forced to sell by the Nazis between 1935 and 1937.

The heirs of the Stern estate are three universities, McGill and Concordia in Montreal, and Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

The painting's unveiling in Berlin was the first time it has been publicly presented in almost 40 years. It was not disclosed where the painting had been since Adenauer, who died in 1967, held it.

Flight Into Egypt is the fifth work recovered since the Concordia-administered Max Stern Art Restitution Project, which is working with the estate, was launched in 2002.

What happened to the painting after it left Stern's hands in the 1930s is not known, except that it eventually became part of the collection of Adenauer, who was the first chancellor of West Germany from 1949 to 1963. A native of Cologne and its one-time mayor, Adenauer was opposed to the Nazi regime.

The estate was able to determine the provenance of the de Cock through recent research by the Netherlands Institute for Art History at the Hague. Its return was facilitated by Christie's auction house and the New York State Banking Department's Holocaust Claims Processing Office.

"We are delighted to have helped resolve this matter," said Monica Dugot, Christie's senior vice-president and international director of restitution. "This is a good example of how co-operation amongst all parties can lead to fair and just solutions to Nazi-looted art cases."

The Berlin event, held at the offices of the University of Toronto, also saw the unveiling of another painting that a U.S. appeals court ruled in November belongs to the Stern estate.

The 19th-century Girl from the Sabine Mountains by Franz Xaver Winterhalter had been the subject of lengthy negotiations and later a legal battle between the estate's executors, headed by Montreal lawyer Robert Vineberg, and the 84-year-old German baroness Maria-Louise Bissonnette of Providence, R.I.

The painting Flight Into Egypt by Flemish master Jan Wellens de Cock has been recovered by the estate of Max Stern.

Her stepfather bought the painting in 1937 for a price well below fair-market value at Cologne's Lempertz auction house, where Stern had to liquidate the remaining 225 works in his inventory before fleeing Germany.

When talks with the estate broke down in 2006, Bissonnette surreptitiously shipped the Winterhalter, which had been in her possession for almost 50 years, to Germany and asked a German court to determine its ownership. It had remained in storage there since.

The Netherlands Institute for Art History has also confirmed that more than 40 additional paintings by other Old Masters such as Brueghel, Van Dyck, Ruisdael and Teniers were among the works Stern sold under duress when the Nazis banned Jews from the art trade.

"These discoveries are extremely important," said Clarence Epstein, head of the Stern Art Restitution Project.

"What is most disconcerting is how many of the paintings from the entire Stern collection remain in circulation in German museums, corporate offices and private collections."

The project, however, only knows the whereabouts of about five to 10 per cent of the looted works, but is committed to tracking down every one of them, Epstein affirmed.

Stern, who owned the landmark Dominion Gallery on Sherbrooke Street for decades, died in 1987. He and his wife, Iris, were childless and named the three universities as the main beneficiaries of their estate.

The press conference took place on the eve of a government-organized symposium on Nazi-looted art, where the Stern estate made a presentation on its efforts to recover the Stern collection.

Those works in private hands are particularly hard to locate, unless they come on the market, as the Winterhalter did in early 2005.

Epstein said the ruling by the First Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in Boston last month was the first in U.S. legal history dealing with the forced sale of Jewish-owned art in Nazi Germany. The judge decided that the circumstances of the sales amounted to "de facto confiscation" by the Third Reich.

The judgment will have an impact on other restitution claims, he said, because it establishes that the Stern art was, in fact, stolen and that those in possession of it today are not the rightful owners. The estate is also working closely with the Art Loss Register in London and the German government's Co-ordination Office for the Return of Cultural Property, established in 1994 to handle claims of confiscation by the Nazis or other losses during World War II.

Latkes, luscious latkes

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Estee Kafra is passionate about food and making it look beautiful on film. She's been thrilling readers of Binah Magazine for the past two years with her fun, innovative, and delicious recipes, like Beef and Vegetable Stew with Red Wine; Celery Root Potato Latkes; and her amazing recipe for Roizy's Famous Kokosh cake.

Now, after culling through countless recipes from Binah magazines of the past two years, testing, tasting and testing again, Kafra has put together an incomparable collection of recipes that will transform your kitchen, whether you're a novice cook or a seasoned pro.

The theme running throughout Spice It Right is, as the name implies, spices. Inside you will find a brief tutorial on various herbs and spices that will teach you how to take the most mundane of recipes and upgrade them into the "crème de la crème" of fine cuisine.

The design of the cookbook is breathtaking, similar in design to Donna Hay's cookbooks, with vibrant colours and tantalizing pictures on every page. Kafra did her own food styling and photography and she has included a full-colour photo for each recipe, which her readers will love.

As a special bonus, Spice it Right also includes a special guide prepared by the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR). This guide gives detailed instructions on checking for and removing suspect insects in fresh herbs.

With easy-to-follow directions and full sections on everything from appetizers to soups, salads, side dishes, main dishes and desserts, this is one cookbook you can't afford not to have in your kitchen! Each recipe includes a helpful clock icon indicating the estimated preparation time.

When I spoke to Kafra recently, she told me she is absolutely thrilled with the response from her readers. Her favourite quote came from an enthusiastic young woman who told her, "Ever since the day that I bought the book, I have used it every night to make supper, and everything I made was delicious!"

Books are being sold worldwide in all Judaica stores. In Toronto, Spice it Right is available at Kitchen Art, Seforim Warehouse, Kosher City, Israel's Judaica and Negev Importing. For more information, check out the website at www.spiceitrightcookbook.com. Spice it Right makes a wonderful gift for Chanukah or any time of year.

Kafra shared two of her favourite Chanukah recipes with me that are sure to impress your family and friends. Enjoy!

CELERY ROOT POTATO LATKES
15 minutes preparation time

Here's a slightly different version of typical potato latkes. The celery root adds wonderful flavour and is a great idea for those who are watching their carbs.

2 cups grated Idaho or russet potatoes
2 cups grated celery root
2 eggs
1/4 cup flavoured breadcrumbs
1 tbsp. fresh parsley, chopped freshly ground black pepper and salt, to taste
vegetable oil for frying

Place the grated potatoes and celery root into a colander and press to squeeze out extra juices.

Pour into a large mixing bowl and add remaining ingredients except oil; mix well.

Heat vegetable oil in a large frying pan and place tablespoons of batter into the hot oil. Be careful not to overcrowd.
Once edges have browned, flip latkes over and cook on other side. Remove latkes from oil with slotted spoon or spatula and place on prepared sheets of paper towel to drain. Yield: 10 latkes.

CRISPY CHEESE LATKES
15 minutes preparation time

I have to confess, it was my cousin Ruchi who requested this recipe. I was making these latkes one day while she was over (they are my children's favourite) and she begged me to include this recipe so she could have her own copy to prepare for her family. Ruchi, this one's for you.

Note: These cheese latkes have less flour, less sugar and more cheese than most printed recipes that I've seen.

1 cup low-fat cottage cheese (I prefer 1 per cent)
1 lb. farmer cheese
4 eggs
1/2 cup plus 2 tbsp. flour
1/3 cup sugar (or less – or substitute with Splenda)
1 tsp. vanilla sugar
low-sugar strawberry jam for garnish oil for frying

Simply place all the ingredients except oil and jam into a large mixing bowl. Using an immersion blender, blend all the ingredients until a thick batter forms.

Heat 2 frying pans with a thin layer of oil. Drop in batter, a tablespoonful at a time. You may have to adjust the temperature so that the first side doesn't burn before you are ready to flip the latkes over. Once the batter has firmed up somewhat and the bottom side is brown, flip over until cooked on the second side.

Remove from the pan and place on paper towel to absorb excess oil.

Variation: I sometimes add a bit of jam in the middle of the latke just before it firms up. To do this, make small indentation in the centre with a spoon and place a small amount of jam in the indentation. Flip over carefully. Enjoy! Yield: 14 latkes.

תיאטרון מפגש עושה היסטוריה

הקנדים טועמים לראשונה בשבועות האחרונים טעם שעד לאחרונה היה זר להם לחלוטין, בעוד שאנו הישראלים שתינו אותו עם חלב אימנו. והכוונה כמובן ל"קואליציה". בישראל, בגלל שיטת הבחירות היחסית, לא היתה מעולם מפלגה בודדת שזכתה ברוב מוחלט, דהיינו 61 מושבים בכנסת, ועל כן התרגלנו שממשלה מורכבת מקואליציה של מספר מפלגות, שהיא האמא של כל הלחצים הפוליטיים, האינטרסנות, הסחטנות של הדתיים, ומה לא. בקנדה, בגלל שיטת הבחירות האזורית, זוכה בדרך כלל מפלגה זו או אחרת ברוב מוחלט שמאפשר לה ארבע שנות שלטון ציבי ושקט. כל זה עד לאחרונה כי מזה שתי מערכות בחירות פדראליות שאין אף מפלגה שזוכה ברוב, והשמרנים מרכיבים ממשלת מיעוט, רוצה לאמר שכל יום אפשר להפילם בפרלמנט בהצבעת אי אמון. לא עלה על דעתם של הקנדים שיכולות שתי מפלגות שונות להתלכד לארבע שנים ולהבטיח שקט פוליטי. זה מתוחכם מידי עבור ראשם המרובע.

I Loved You So Long הוא סיפורה של אשה שיוצאת מבית הסוהר אחרי שנים רבות של מאסר, ועוסק בסיפור קשיי קליטתה, האינטראקציה שלה עם אחותה שתיכנה לה בחוץ ומשפחת האחות. במהלך הסרט מתברר סיפור נוגע ללב על נסיבות מאסרה, ומבלי להרוס לכם את העלילה, אומר שזהאחד הסרטים הטובים ביותר שראיתי בשנים האחרונות. עשר בסולם קורן. Tell No One הוא סיפורו של רופא ילדים צרפתי שאשתו נרצחה ונקברה לפני מספר שנים, והוא מקבל יום אחד שדר מסתורי ממנה. זהו סרט מתח פסיכולוגי מעולה, שבניגוד לסרטים אמריקאיים דומים-יש בו גם בניית דמויות ודיאלוגים מעולים. עשר בסולם קורן.

David Lawrence Ezrin ז"ל

Born on Dec. 3, 1966 in Toronto, Canada, the son of Bob Ezrin and Arlene Sarner, passed on Dec. 4, 2008 in Los Angeles, California. He was 42 years old. David was a well-known LA musician, composer and songwriter with several gold and platinum albums and compositions on dozens of recordings. He was also a partner in Soul Surfer Records. Music and family were David's life. David was a devoted father, who is survived by his beloved daughter Zoe (13), the light of his life; his parents, Arlene Sarner and Bob Ezrin; his devoted step-parents Jerry Leichtling, Fran Ezrin and Janet Ezrin; his loving siblings, half-siblings and step-siblings: Joshua Ezrin, Sarah Ezrin, Daniel Leichtling, Geoffrey and Jennifer Repo; and his grandparents Calvin and Geraldine Ezrin. David was especially close to his aunts Judith Ezrin and Joanna Schauer (nee Ezrin), and his uncle Joseph Vankay all of whom were just a few years older than him and were more like siblings than aunts/uncles. He was also very close to his cousins Randi Aichel and Jeremy Rubolino and so many other family members. This large family beginning with Zoe and radiating outward to all of its extensions was David's greatest pride, his comfort and his safety. A service was held in Los Angeles on Dec. 7, 2008. David was a supporter of the efforts of the MusiCares Foundation, a charitable arm of the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences. The family grieves his untimely passing but knows that he is at peace.

Good night sweet prince.

Hillel says it was a victim of discrimination at U of O

By CARA STERN
Special to The CJN

A group at the University of Ottawa that promotes social justice and human rights discriminated against Jewish students by refusing to endorse or promote a Hillel event, says Raphael Szajnfarber, city-wide president for Hillel in Ottawa,.

Hillel had invited a speaker, Israel Siriri, an African Jew, to discuss his community-based sustainable projects in Uganda, including a school for Jewish, Christian, and Muslim youth, Szajnfarber said.

He said Hillel approached a number of groups that might be interested in helping out in some way with the Nov. 20 event, including the Ontario Public Interest Research Group (OPIRG).

"We were hoping that they'd be able to send out the information on their listserv and advertise the event for us," Szajnfarber said, adding that Hillel didn't ask for monetary contributions.

OPIRG denied Hillel's request.

"This decision was made because of your organization and its relationship to apartheid Israel," OPIRG's board of directors wrote in an e-mail response to Hillel.

"Zionist ideology does not fit within OPIRG's mandate of human right's (sic), social justice."

Szajnfarber said Hillel is not a political organization, but rather calls itself "the foundation for Jewish campus life."

OPIRG board member Sarah King said the problem is not religious but political.

"We're in no way against Jewish events," she said. "I know it's been said that we're anti-Semites. That's totally not true."

However, Szajnfarber said he sees OPIRG's actions as discrimination against Jewish students.

"The students of the university are funding this organization," he said.

King said OPIRG receives a levy of $3.38 from each undergraduate student per semester, and $2.50 from each graduate students per semester, which can only be refunded during two designated weeks.

Students were able to opt out in the fall semester between Nov. 4 and Nov. 17, and the next opportunity students have is between March 3 and March 16.

"If they're going to take stances that are very offensive to some groups – specifically in this case the Jewish students – I think this is something that should be… understood by all students," Szajnfarber said.

"We stand for human rights, for social justice, environmental justice," King said. "That's why we support so many student groups on campus."

One of the groups King named is the Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR).

When asked why OPIRG supports SPHR and not Hillel, she said, "SPHR has been proposed to be an action group, while Hillel is an entity separate that would easily exist without OPIRG. SPHR came to us wanting to use our resources as an action group."

Szajnfarber said that although Hillel is a Zionist organization that supports a peaceful two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the Siriri event was apolitical and had nothing to do with the Middle East.

"It was a success story of a Ugandan community group, which brings together kind of a multicultural array of Ugandans working together in a community," he said. "If that's political, I'm not sure what isn't."

Szajnfarber said Hillel isn't satisfied with the OPIRG's explanation for its refusal to promote the event and will be meeting with the group's representatives about the issue this week.

He said he's hoping for a public apology from the group for discriminating against Hillel.

"We think the way that they're funded should be revisited," he added.

"But more specifically, we want to be working with all campus groups, and we hope that they will revisit their policy of discrimination and not wanting to work with us."

Funding for McGill group on hold

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — A proposed fee increase for the McGill University chapter of the controversial Quebec Public Interest Research Group (QPIRG) has been put on hold after a student referendum on the issue failed to get quorum.

Adding 75 cents to QPIRG's existing three-dollar-per-semester ancillary fee from students was opposed by Hillel McGill, due to QPIRG's support for anti-Israel groups such as Tadamon, whose goals include de-listing Hezbollah as a federally designated terror group and imposing academic, economic and cultural boycotts on Israel.

A left-wing student-run political organization, QPIRG organizes programs such as Radical Frosh, a two-day introduction to community activism, and it funds some 15 "working groups" that address social justice issues.

Other QPIRG activities include the annual "Culture Shock" week, which recently hosted a symposium together with Tadamon and Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) titled "Human Rights Law and Palestine/Israel: Exploring the Apartheid Paradigm."

The increase was voted on in McGill's fall student referendum period, along with other fee adjustments. All of them failed to garner the required 15 per cent student turnout. Only about 2,500 students cast ballots, representing almost 13 per cent of eligible voters.

Referendum questions on fee increases can only be submitted in the fall semester, but QPIRG can ask the Students Society of McGill University to declare a special referendum, to be held during the winter semester election period in March, said Nicole Gileadi, chief electoral officer for Elections McGill.

QPIRG board member Max Silverman told the McGill Tribune that if QPIRG is allowed to, it will put the issue to another referendum in the winter.

The proposed fee would have given QPIRG an additional $40,000 per year to go toward the group's programming and working groups. The last time the fee was raised was in 1988.

"We wanted to keep the fee as minimal as possible. Students feel that the fee increase is a really reasonable one, and they can see why we're proposing it," Silverman told The CJN.

But Hillel program co-ordinator Jonathan Taylor said that even a modest increase is unacceptable.

"We've had many, many students come up to us asking what's going on with QPIRG, so we have a responsibility to them. If QPIRG is really in the interests of all students, it's not right that they demonize Israel."

QPIRG's internal co-ordinator Leila Pourtavaf said that support for organizations such as Tadamon is only a small part of the group's budget.

"I think that it's very true and fair that Tadamon and Hillel have very different views on the question of Israel, but Tadamon is only one of 15 working groups and all of them only get around $10,000 total," she said.

"To say that Tadamon is what QPIRG does is totally ludicrous. That's not to say that we don't support them, but it's far from all we do."

Family members often feel isolated from community

"When only 50 per cent of us would tell a friend that a family member has a mental illness, while 72 per cent would disclose a cancer diagnosis, there's something seriously wrong."

Kugelmass said the Jewish community here, like the general population, must understand that mental illness is not a failure of character.

"It's a real disease like anything else. We've made headway, but we're not able to address it. The major issue is isolation. People with family members who have a mental illness feel isolated from the rest of the community because there isn't a broader discussion of the needs within the Jewish community."

"John," who spoke to The CJN on condition of anonymity, has an adult brother who suffers from schizophrenia and lives with his parents, aging Holocaust survivors.

"My parents have been burdened with this issue for as long as they could remember. Yet, despite being Holocaust survivors and their elderly age, they have nobody to turn to for support within the community," John said.

He said that the stigma attached to mental illness, which keeps them from seeking community support, adds to their suffering.

"I think if people would rally together and speak openly about it, like any other physical ailments, [Jewish leaders] would get together and there would be more recognition," he said, adding that he recognized the irony of encouraging others to speak out when he was speaking anonymously himself.

"By hiding behind anonymity, we're just perpetuating it, but it's one thing for me to talk about it, and it's another thing for me to do it at the expense of my parents, who are very secretive about the whole thing," he said.

"And that's part of the problem. They are Holocaust survivors – they are, generally speaking, very secretive, so to openly discuss matters of this kind is very difficult for them… The idea of going to a support group is completely foreign to them."

John said, however, that his parents have taken a few steps to seek support in taking care of their adult son.

"They visited psychiatrists, they turned to medication, but there has been no form of counselling. Not for my parents or my brother," he said.

"What most people don't realize is that this kind of illness has a huge impact, not only on the person who has the illness, but on all the caregivers surrounding that person. Sometimes the caregivers have support and sometimes they don't. [My parents] have zero support."

"Rachel" also chose to speak with The CJN on condition of anonymity, because her son, who suffers from a mild form of schizophrenia, doesn't know that she decided to speak about her experience. She said that the Toronto Jewish community must address the lack of resources for Jews with mental illness.

"We're terribly short of funding, and as you can appreciate, mental illness is not fashionable to talk about," she said.

"It goes back to another generation where everyone who had some disability was kept in the house, there weren't the medications that they have today, [and] it was a totally different mindset."

She said her son had a mental breakdown about four years ago, following the sudden death of his father.

"My son stayed with me for about four weeks, and I thought he was staying with me to comfort me and keep me company, but then when it was time to leave… he completely fell apart. Sometimes it takes a certain situation to be the trigger and he was admitted to the psychiatric unit in a hospital and he was there for eight months. They tried all kinds of medications," Rachel said.

Her son was transferred to a hospital in Whitby where he stayed for three months, and when it was time for him to be released, she was faced with a problem of what to do with him.

"I didn't want to burden anyone with having to look after him and I'm getting on. I said, 'What will happen when I'm not around? Sure, he could live here, but then what happens? He'll be out on the street,'" Rachel said.

"I kept advocating. I didn't leave a stone unturned. They told me they had a lot of good group homes in Lindsay, [Ont.] and Woodstock, [Ont.], but I said that's not good enough. I want him in a Jewish environment. Who do I turn to? What do I do?"

Although Kugelmass, John and Rachel say there are too few resources within the Jewish community, there are some that offer support for the mentally ill and their families. Part 2 of this three-part series will examine those resources and the challenges the service providers face.

For more information about the issue, you can reach Kugelmass at jack@jackkugelmass.com.

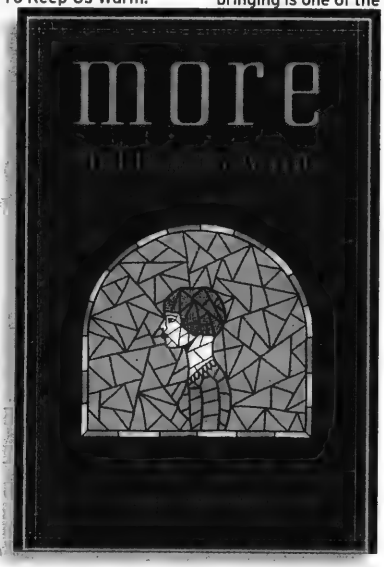
Governor General's Award winner writes about love, loss and religion

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
Special to The CJN

Like many poets, Jacob Scheier wrote because he felt compelled to do so. However, unlike many poets, Scheier's compulsion came from the death of his poet mother when he was 19 years old.

Now 28, Scheier is the latest recipient of a Governor General's Literary Award for poetry for his first book of poems, More To Keep Us Warm.



Scheier is still reeling from the win. "It was very surreal," he says. "It's a very satisfying feeling to know that this jury made of very accomplished writers thought that this was the most outstanding book the year. It's a great honour, and I'm still absorbing it."

More To Keep Us Warm is a collection of poems that explore and work through the themes of, among others, love, loss, life and religion. The peppering of humour, pop culture, and the literary, historical and Canadian references Scheier calls on enlivens the heavy topics.

Scheier was raised in Toronto and graduated from York University. He now lives in Brooklyn, N.Y. His mother, poet Libby Scheier, and father were separated for as long as Jacob can remember, and he grew up mostly with his mother.

Libby lost her fight against cancer in 2000. Jacob describes that period as insurmountably challenging for both of them, as Libby's body and mind were stolen by the disease.

"She was virtually my only system of support, and it was extremely traumatizing," Scheier remembers. "The disease altered her personality, and it made it so extremely difficult."

Before his mother's death, Scheier wrote as a hobby, with no career ambitions. More To Keep Us Warm was born during the six years following her death. Writing was the only thing that helped him engage with his grief.

"I felt compelled to do it, as though if I didn't, I would at the very least... throw up or much worse," he says carefully. "I didn't become a poet because my mother was a poet. I become a poet because she wasn't there."

Many of his pieces deal with grief and loss, both of a loved one, and the loss of a romantic partner. Some have historical, political or Jewish themes, with titles such as Footage from Haifa and Kaddish for 1956.

An evocative piece titled My Religious Upbringing details the contrast between his mother's home, with a menorah and a Christmas tree ("Not wanting me to feel too different.../ We were just the right amount of Jewish"), and his father's, with no holiday adornments and a strong mantra that "religion is the opiate of the masses."

Scheier says it's hard for him to distinguish between what is fact and what is fiction in his work, as they blend together. He says My Religious Upbringing is one of the more truthful pieces and most reflective of his childhood.

Scheier feels strongly about what he labels his secular, Jewish political heritage and recently has been exploring that identity further through the journeys of his immigrant grandparents and his parents' experiences.

"It's really that Jewish immigrant story, but along with it, these generations of political radicalism," he says, noting his father remains a staunch Marxist-Leninist.

Scheier is living in Brooklyn temporarily, while working on his second book of poetry. It will focus on his parent's relationship when it was a happy one and on the political climate that shaped their union when they lived in New York in the late 1960s and early '70s.

"[I want to discuss] my parents who I never knew in this context and how Judaism fits in to that tradition. A lot of Jews end up as socialists and why is that? I'm aware of some of the sociological answers, but I am interested in engaging it through the medium of poetry. I am dealing with a lot of questions right now," he says.

Before he received the Governor General's Award, on Dec. 9, Scheier's win was the subject of some controversy. Some people in the literary community questioned whether his winning was ethical, as two of the three jury members were listed on Scheier's page of acknowledgments. The Canadian literary website Bookninja (www.bookninja.com) has several blog pages devoted to this hot topic.

Of the three jurors on the selection panel, poet Di Brandt is credited with helping to translate a poem, and along with poet Pier Giorgio Di Cicco, is thanked on the acknowledgment page.

Scheier feels that the controversy was detrimental to the building of a supportive community among poets and artists. He says he thanked both writers for giving him feedback over a six-year writing process, before the poems were sent off to a publisher as a complete book, and that the fuss detracted from the credit that should be given to his editor, Michael Holmes.

"I find the situation sad and upsetting, and not just because it hurts me on a personal level," Scheier says. "It shows me that we need to be building stronger and more supportive communities among writers, and I feel that one of the things the situation is showing me is that we don't have a very supportive network for poets, who are so marginalized already."

The head of writing and publishing for the Canada Council, Melanie Rutledge, told the Toronto Star that the council stands by what it saw as a "consensual decision" by all three jury members, but accepts the negative feedback from some members of the community and will "continue to try to do the best we can."

Scheier says this award is as much for his mother as for him, and he knows she would be proud of him. The senior writer, however, left her son with a piece of advice: don't become a professional writer because it is a hard life with terrible politics.

"It's a prophetic moment, that was, looking back," Scheier says. "So she would also be saying, 'I told you so.'"

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Gene study confirms Spain's Jewish heritage

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

The late Gen. Francisco Franco, Spain's long-ruling dictator, has often been quoted as saying, "Jewish blood runs through the veins of every gentile Spaniard."

Through A Sephardi Window

Franco, of course, was referring to the fact that in the year 700 CE, the Muslim Moors of North Africa conquered much of what today is Spain. Many Jews also came to Spain at that time. Together, they enjoyed a period of unparalleled enlightenment. This is referred to as the Golden Age of Spanish Jewry, which continued until 1492, when the Catholic monarchs Ferdinand and Isabella consolidated what is known historically as the Christian re-conquest of Spain.

At that time, anyone not professing the Catholic faith was to be expelled. It is known through the churches own records of the auto de fe (the ritual of public penance of condemned heretics and apostates) that a large number of Jews chose to outwardly profess Catholicism, but secretly practised Judaism as best as they could. This significant subculture was vilified: the word "marrano" means swine. They were persecuted, tortured and often executed in public burnings.

Well, it now seems that notwithstanding Franco's estimation, scientific study has proven that Jewish blood doesn't actually run through the veins of every Spaniard – it only runs through the veins of about 20 per cent of them.

A paper published this month in the American Journal of Human Genetics reports on a study conducted by geneticists from Pompeau Fabra University in Barcelona and the University of Leicester in Britain.

It focused on the unique makeup of the Y chromosome, the chromosome that passes from father to son as a virtual carbon copy of itself. The Y chromosome of a cross section of Spanish men was then compared to the Y chromosome of both Jewish and Arab men of North Africa (Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia), places where expelled Jews and Muslims fled. The researchers found that this chromosome was similar in one-third of instances, making Jews and Muslims together the ancestors of one-third of Spaniards.

It would be of great interest if this study could be extended to other locales where secret Jews are known to have taken refuge – for example, pockets of South America, New Mexico and, of course, around the Iberian Peninsula.

Another good starting point would be the island of Malta, where there is an unusually high percentage of typically Jewish Sephardi names among the non-Jewish population.

Two challenges for communal leadership

Class Act
By Daniel Held

After four years of service, I recently stepped down from the board of directors of one of our community agencies. The past four years have been filled with learning and personal growth. I learned about lay leadership and governance. I formed personal positions on the allocation of communal funds and leadership development. My term on the board gave me skills, knowledge, contacts and experience. It has empowered me as a communal leader.

In building community, we often speak about two key stages: engagement and empowerment. First we need to get people in the door – excite them, motivate them and engage them. Next, we must give them the skills, knowledge and wherewithal to take on a leadership role. We must empower them.

Our community is designed in this way. The new camping initiative, Top Bunk, and Birthright Israel are prime examples of engagement. They specifically target under-affiliated youth and offer experiences that will invigorate participants and convince them to come back for more. Both programs have had great success bridging the gap between Jewish youth and the community.

At the same time, our community offers opportunities for empowerment. Many committees actively recruit young members to offer fresh ideas and insight. Young adults have taken leadership roles in every aspect of our community, creating new programs and reinvigorating old standards.

There are, however, two challenges to this system.

The first challenge is one of bridging. In a past column, I wrote about the need for "bus drivers" of Jewish education. They are the connectors who guide members of our community from affiliation to affiliation – school to camp to volunteering to Hillel to synagogue, etc. In a similar way, we aren't yet good enough at moving a young adult from being engaged to being empowered. Hillel – which fills both tasks – and the Birthright alumni community strive to move students from the engagement phase to being empowered young leaders. They, however, need to be assisted by the community to find the right match for their individual talents and interests.

The second challenge is engaging the already engaged. Both Birthright Israel and Top Bunk try to limit their enrolment to the "under-engaged." Birthright Israel is for young adults, aged 18 to 26, who have not been on a peer-group Israel trip. Top Bunk is for children in grades 2 to 7 who are currently not attending a Jewish day school.

The problem, of course, is that many young people who have already been to Israel and many children in day school still need experiences such as Birthright and summer camp to engage them in Jewish living. By restricting enrolment, we may be narrowing our market to those who have not yet experienced these positive activities. At the same time, however, we may be keeping these experiences away from others who need them.

Research on Israel trips indicates that the second peer-group experience – not the first – has the greatest impact on Jewish identity. My own Jewish day school career spoke to me most when I was able to contextualize the classroom learning of school into the daily Jewish living of camp.

We need to engage the under-engaged. We need to offer them experiences such as Birthright and Top Bunk that will draw them in and encourage them to seek out new forms Jewish affiliation. At the same time, however, we need to offer the next step for those already engaged in Jewish education. If we restrict them from some opportunities, we must offer parallel experiences to empower them – to channel their creativity and their passion toward building a vibrant Jewish community.

I am grateful to my colleagues on the board and the professional leaders who served as mentors and teachers over the last four years. They took a young, engaged activist and found ways to empower me and push me to take the next step in communal leadership.

I hope we can find new ways to replicate this form of empowerment.

Jewish Life

Books, readers and the new year

Books
Bernard Baskin

As the new year dawns, we beleaguered readers face multiple distractions – so much competition for our limited time and attention.

The electronic age with its alluring invitation to information and entertainment threatens to overwhelm us as we slowly make our way from page to page.

It's time for reassurance. Books as a form of pleasure can offer knowledge, distraction, delight and solace.

Jews especially should cherish books as part of an age-old tradition. Whenever they grew frayed or tattered, it was considered sacrilegious to discard them. They were placed in a synagogue's attic or special repository. In time, these books were solemnly buried.

Rabbinical literature is full of admonitions about the duty of a Jew to lend books, even to enemies (so that learning will be increased); of the obligation of every community of Jews to build a library; of meticulous advice about the binding, airing, care, and preservation of books and manuscripts.

Leo Rosten in his book Treasury of Jewish Quotations reminds us of the vast number of books that were destroyed forever. After the expulsion from Spain, thousands of Jews fled to Lisbon; the authorities there soon issued a decree that anyone owning a Hebrew book would be put to death. In Venice, in 1553, in the "bitter month" (Cheshvan), officials burned Talmuds and thousands of other volumes. So did the Romans, who ransacked all Jewish homes and burned their books in the Campo dei Fiori. Countless precious Hebrew manuscripts and incunabula from before the year 1500 no longer exist. Indeed, the complete text of the Babylonian Talmud survived in only one ancient manuscript from which additional copies could be made.

We tend to forget what a miracle a book really is. By means of 26 letters – intricate symbols of communication – abstract thoughts and ideas are conveyed. Across the span of centuries, without regard to geography, the book speaks. It has the power to teach, inspire, activate and delight. It can dilate the mind, open windows on new horizons, foment revolution and sustain the troubled spirit.

It's no wonder that Charles Lamb maintained that there is more reason for saying grace before one begins a new book than before a meal. For a meal and its satisfactions are soon forgotten, but the power and influence of a worthy book are unending.

How is one to find time for reading? This is a constant problem in our frenzied, complex, many-sided modern world. It is helpful, however, to keep in mind a simple reckoning that I have brought to your attention before. The average reader, when he is dealing with material of medium difficulty, can absorb about 300 words a minute. In 15 minutes, this comes to about 4,500 words. Fifteen minutes a day over a year gives us 1,642,500 words, the equivalent of about 22 books averaging 75,000 words each. Fifteen minutes a day over a period of 50 years of sustained reading means that we can read 1,100 books in our lifetime.

There is one supreme consolation about books. The joy we are describing is safe, as well as enduring. Many people have exercised themselves to death, many have played themselves to death, many have worried themselves to death – no one has ever thought himself to death or died from the ecstasy of learning. Our body gradually dies, our emotions become dull, but the mind continues to live, and can grow ever more alive, volatile and encompassing.

Leon Gutterman gave us these precious words: "Without the love of books, the richest man is poor; but endowed with this treasure of treasures, the poorest man is rich. He has wealth which no power can diminish; riches which are always increasing; possessions which the more he scatters the more they accumulate; friends which never desert him and pleasures which never die."

More on menorahs, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we began our look at insights and websites about Chanukah's most famous symbol. Today, more on menorahs.

Chabad's Virtual Chanukah site has pictures of menorahs from Boston to Bologna and from Denver to Disney World. [tinyurl.com/chanuchabad]

Those displays are certain to catch your eye, but I am sure many people have special memories of smaller, more intimate menorahs. I stumbled across this lovely story about how your taste in menorahs says something about your taste in partners. "Finally opening the box, he pulled out the menorah he had ordered a long time ago. Her eyes lit up like they did a few years ago when he proposed. It was a hand-painted ceramic menorah, and it was just the most beautiful thing to her. Without knowing what kind of menorah she wanted, he had found the perfect one. They were perfect for each other. It was the little things like this that let her know." [tinyurl.com/menoperf]

I'm not sure the Maccabees had this in mind when they celebrated the first Chanukah, but I did come across a site that puts an interesting environmental twist on the miracle associated with this holiday. The Green Menorah is described as "the symbol of a covenant among Jewish communities and congregations to renew the miracle of Chanukah in our own generation: using one day's oil to meet eight days' needs: doing our part so that by 2020, U.S. oil consumption is cut by seven-eighths." [shalomctr.org/node/1186]

Although the tradition of lighting Chanukah candles may seem obvious, the Ohr Somayach website tackles plenty of contemporary questions about the commandment. For example, how can you fulfil the mitzvah if an overnight flight from the United States to Europe means you won't have the opportunity to light a menorah? The response: "In this case there is no obligation to light Chanukah lights. The Talmud describes the mitzvah to light Chanukah lights as 'a candle for a person and his home' (Shabbat 21b). The obligation to light Chanukah candles applies only if you are based in a home at the appropriate time for fulfilling the mitzvah. But if you're riding with your family in a car or plane the entire night – and there's nobody residing in your home – you're exempt from lighting Chanukah candles." [ohr.org.il/special/chanukah]

If you are earthbound during the holiday, you may want to try your hand at making your own menorah. The Mazornet.com site has four plans, including the Builder's Special, which uses ceramic tiles and shot glasses. [tinyurl.com/chanubuild] Here are more menorah crafts.

- Clay [tinyurl.com/menoclay]
- Potato [tinyurl.com/menotato]
- Baby food jars [tinyurl.com/menojars]

I normally don't plug commercial products in this column, but there is one other do-it-yourself chanukiyah that caught my attention. The Hershey's Kisses Sweet Menorah calls for a base of silver-foiled chocolates topped by nine cardboard "candles." On each night, an additional red-foiled Kiss "flame" is added until all the candles are lit. I had mixed feelings when I read the line advising not to eat your menorah. [tinyurl.com/chanukiss]

I wasn't all that surprised to see that menorahs have also graduated into the high-tech world. There are numerous instructions for building "menorahs" using LEDs (light emitting diodes) that range from ultra basic [tinyurl.com/meno led1] to somewhat fancy. [tinyurl. com/menoled2]

And then there are menorahs that aren't really there at all, because they live on your computer screen. You can download one that works with Desktop Google; [tinyurl.com/menogoogle] a dashboard widget for Macs; [tinyurl.com/macmenorah] a Windows variation; [tinyurl.com/winmenorah] and inevitably, an iPhone version. [tinyurl.com/meniphone]

If you like, you can watch the Torah.org On-line Menorah as it is updated daily during the holiday to illustrate that night's candle configuration. As the site mentions in a tongue-in-cheek fashion, "Note! Rabbinic authorities agree: you can't fulfil the mitzvah by looking at a computer screen! [torah.org/learning/yomtov/ chanukah]

Have a very happy holiday.

Jewish philanthropist arrested

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — The Jewish non-profit world has been rocked by the securities fraud of Bernard Madoff, and the worst may be yet to come.

Madoff, the founder of Bernard L. Madoff Investment Securities LLC, was arrested Dec. 11 after admitting to his board that a hedge fund he ran was essentially a $50-billion "Ponzi" scheme, a type of illegal pyramid.

Since then, at least two foundations have been forced to close their doors because they had invested most of their funds with Madoff: The Robert I. Lappin Foundation in Salem, Mass., announced Dec. 12 that it would close after losing $8 million – all of its money – through investments with Madoff. And the Chais Family Foundation, which gives out some $12.5 million each year to Jewish causes in Israel, the former Soviet Union and eastern Europe, announced Dec. 14 that it had closed. At least one non-profit is calling out for help in the wake of Madoff's collapse: The Gift of Life Foundation, a Jewish bone marrow registry that relied heavily on Madoff as a benefactor, announced on its website Sunday that it would immediately need to raise $1.8 million to make up for recent losses.

Sources close to Yeshiva University, where Madoff served as treasurer of the board of trustees and chairman of board of YU's Sy Syms School of Business until he resigned last week, said that the school has lost tens of millions of dollars, if not more.

Israel may get 'nuclear umbrella'

By ALUF BENN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

U.S. president-elect Barack Obama's administration will offer Israel a "nuclear umbrella" against the threat of a nuclear attack by Iran, a well-placed American source said last week.

The source, who is close to the new administration, said the United States will declare that an attack on Israel by Tehran would result in a devastating U.S. nuclear response against Iran.

But America's nuclear guarantee to Israel could also be interpreted as a sign the United States believes Iran will eventually acquire nuclear arms.

Secretary of state-designate Hillary Clinton had raised the idea of a nuclear guarantee to Israel during her campaign for the Democratic party's nomination for the presidency. During a debate with Obama in April, Clinton said that Israel and Arab countries must be given "deterrent backing." She added, "Iran must know that an attack on Israel will draw a massive response."

Clinton also proposed that the American nuclear umbrella be extended to other countries in the region, such as Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States, if they agree to relinquish their own nuclear ambitions.

According to the same source, the nuclear guarantee would be backed by a new and improved Israeli anti-ballistic missile system. The Bush administration took the first step by deploying an early warning radar system in the Negev, which hones the ability to detect Iranian ballistic missiles.

Obama said last week that he would negotiate with Iran and would offer economic incentives for Tehran to relinquish its nuclear program. He warned that if Iran refused the deal, he would act to intensify sanctions against the Islamic Republic.

Granting Israel a nuclear guarantee essentially suggests the United States is willing to come to terms with a nuclear Iran. For its part, Israel opposes any such development, and similar opposition was voiced by officials in the outgoing Bush administration.

The same source noted that the fact that there is talk about the possibility of a nuclear Iran undermines efforts to prevent Tehran from acquiring such arms.

Cotler calls on world to prevent genocide by Iran

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada's former justice minister last week called on the international community to exercise its "responsibility to prevent" genocide by taking a host of measures against the government of Iran, including strengthened sanctions and legal actions against the country's president.

Irwin Cotler released a 79-page petition that set out in detail breaches by Iran of the Genocide Convention sufficient to warrant legal actions against the Mideast state.

"There's a toxic combination of the nuclear and the genocidal," coupled with repeated threats to annihilate Israel, Cotler said in a telephone interview from Israel.

Cotler, who has served as federal justice minister and attorney general, was in Jerusalem last week to present the petition during a conference marking the 60th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. He was keynote speaker at the event, which was sponsored by Bar-Ilan University, NGO Monitor and the Global Law Forum – Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs.

Cotler said release of the petition was the opening salvo in a broad range of advocacy measures designed "to hold [Iranian president Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad to account."

Thirteen countries that are party to the Genocide Convention, including Canada, will be called upon to bring Ahmadinejad to justice. The Liberal Party has endorsed the petition, and it has been presented to Foreign Minister Lawrence Cannon with the request that "Canada be among the first countries to bring Ahmadinejad to account."

Irvwin Cotler

Canada has been at the forefront of efforts at the United Nations General Assembly to censure Iran for gross human rights violations, recently co-sponsoring a resolution that accused Iran of torture, executing juveniles, discriminating against women and violating the rights of religious and ethnic minorities.

Cotler hopes Canada will refer Iran's threats to the UN Security Council for deliberation and action.

"Iran has said that one bomb will wipe Israel off the map. This toxicity of the genocidal and the nuclear must be joined together at the UN Security Council and not disconnected or sanitized," he said.

From Israel, Cotler will travel to the Czech Republic to press the case against Iran. "The Czechs understand the dangers of indifference and impunity," he said, noting the Czech Republic will assume the presidency of the European Union beginning Jan. 1.

Other countries that will be asked to step up against Iran are Australia; the United States; Germany, Iran's biggest trading partner; Rwanda, and Argentina, which has indicted senior Iranian leaders for planning the terrorist attack against the AMIA Jewish centre in Buenos Aires, as well as France, the United Kingdom, Jordan, Russia, Israel and India.

In public statements, Israel has emphasized Iran's nuclear capabilities but played down the genocidal threat.

"I think they should be joining the two," Cotler said, even though the Israelis "are skeptical and cynical regarding the use of legal remedies at the UN."

Iran's supreme leader, Ali Khamenei has employed "incendiary rhetoric not just against Israel but against Jews," describing Jews as malevolent, evil, greedy and murderers, Cotler said.

Despite the existence of the Genocide Convention, mass murders have taken place in the Balkans, Rwanda and Darfur. The international community still has time to prevent Iran from carrying out its threats to perpetrate another genocide, he said.

Leaders clash over Ahmadinejad

By DEVORAH LAUTER
JTA

PARIS — Iranian and French leaders clashed over the French president's scathing public rebuke of Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

On Dec. 11, the Iranian foreign minister reportedly protested Nicolas Sarkozy's "extreme" criticism of Iran's leaders, along with his refusal to shake hands with or sit at the same table as Ahmadinejad.

Nicolas Sarkozy

During a human rights speech last week, French President Nicolas Sarkozy criticized the Iranian president's past statements about Israel and the Holocaust.

In a Dec. 8 speech commemorating the 60th anniversary of the UN Declaration of Human Rights, Sarkozy said, "I can't sit at a table – after what the Shoah was, after what the 20th century was – with a man who dared say Israel should be wiped off the map."

Sarkozy also said France still needs to participate in solving the threat of a nuclear-armed Iran. He added that it's a "shame" that the Iranian people should "be represented by certain leaders" and that they "have to think: who is representing them?"

On Dec. 10, the Iranian Foreign Ministry summoned the French ambassador to Tehran to warn him "about the repercussion on bilateral relations of any repetition of such ill-considered remarks."

The French Foreign Ministry stood by Sarkozy's remarks late last Thursday, but it said discussions between the countries was still necessary.

Meanwhile, Ahmadinejad repeated last week that Israel would "fade away from the earth."

His latest prediction of Israel's demise was made during a rally last Friday in Tehran protesting Israel's blockade of the Gaza Strip.

"The crimes being committed by the Zionist regime are happening because it is aware that it has reached the end of the line and will soon fade away from the earth," the Mehr news agency quoted Ahmadinejad as saying, in remarks translated by DPA, the German press agency. He also said Israel is losing western support.

Ahmadinejad has said repeatedly that he wishes Israel would disappear.

Israel is blockading Gaza in a bid to end rocket attacks on Israel's south.

Tense situation expected along Gaza border

Israeli defence officials predicted that this week would be tense along the Israel-Gaza border, as the ceasefire between Israel and Hamas came to an end.

Maj.-Gen. Amos Gilad, the head of political military policy at the Defence Ministry, flew to Cairo on Sunday morning to meet with top Egyptian intelligence officials to discuss the future of the truce.

Deputy Prime Minister Haim Ramon blasted Defence Minister Ehud Barak for sending Gilad, saying he should have held off until after a government decision on whether to pursue a ceasefire extension.

"Ministers who supported the ceasefire in previous votes have said it is out of order to conduct negotiations before the government decides on its stance, on the basis that it will present the government with a fait accompli."

Barak replied that the meetings are routine and have nothing to do with the impending end to the ceasefire. He added that Israeli policy would only change via the appropriate channels.

Defence Ministry officials told Ha'aretz that Israel has made it clear to Hamas, via Egypt, that it would not agree to a continuation of the current situation and that there must be a return to a full ceasefire.

The assumption in Jerusalem is that while Hamas will seek to extend the ceasefire, it will also try to alter the terms of the agreement to allow it to continue firing rockets and mortars at the western Negev at will.

In the coming days, Israeli defence officials expect Hamas to increase the number of provocative attacks against Israeli targets, in an attempt to force Israel to accept less stringent ceasefire conditions. The unwritten ceasefire agreement that Egypt brokered between Israel and Hamas in June does not specify an expiry date. Hamas has said in the past that the agreement is valid for six months, and that its extension depends on expanding the ceasefire to the West Bank. It now appears that Hamas will not insist on this demand, but, in order to avoid domestic criticism for bowing to pressure from Israel, it will not officially accept that there is any ceasefire as of next week.

At the same time, Hamas will continue to fire a relatively small number of rockets and will not prevent other organizations from doing the same. The Israel Defence Forces believes Hamas will focus most of its efforts on the "perimeter," the 500-metre strip of land on the Gazan side of the border fence. The goal is to have Israel become accustomed to Hamas' presence in this area, while also making the IDF pay a price for any attempt to attack militants inside this buffer zone.

Israel Briefs

Feiglin moved down list

Likud party pariah Moshe Feiglin was dropped from 20th to 36th spot on the party's election slate. The head of the right-wing Jewish Leadership Movement now has less chance of becoming an MK in February elections. Polls show Likud winning 30 to 35 seats. Feiglin's position dropped after a petition was submitted to Likud's internal committee by an associate of party head Benjamin Netanyahu, who wanted members elected by district to hold higher positions than nationally elected ones. Feiglin, who favours removing Arabs from Israel, said he'll appeal.

Gap coming

The Gap is coming to Israel. The clothing retailer plans to open its first two stores in Israel in key Jerusalem and Tel Aviv malls soon, Ynetnews reported. The chain also plans to open stores in Jordan and Egypt soon.

Recognize villages: report

Unrecognized Bedouin villages in the Negev should be made official, a commission said. The homes of more than 40,000 Bedouins in more than 40 unincorporated villages should be made legal or the residents should receive compensation, the report by a retired judge said.

UN urges ongoing talks in 2009

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The United Nations Security Council was expected to adopt a resolution on Tuesday calling on Israel and the Palestinian Authority to continue negotiations on the core issues during the course of 2009.

The resolution states that negotiations are to continue after both the Israeli and Palestinian leaders have completed their terms, in efforts to achieve "two states for two peoples."

The core issues on the negotiations table between Israel and the Palestinians include the fate of Jerusalem, parts of which the Palestinians envision as the capital of their future state, the fate of the Palestinian refugees, and the borders of a future Palestinian homeland. Sources in Jerusalem said that the move was likely to force Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu to commit to the peace deal brokered at the November 2007 Annapolis conference, should he be elected prime minister in February, as polls predict.

Singer taps the talents of local music legends

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Best known to music fans as part of the music group Dr. Music, with the late award-winning Canadian composer and pianist Doug Riley, and then part of the country duo Silver & DeGazio, singer/songwriter Rhonda Silver released her first solo CD this summer, Twelve Pieces of Silver.

"I always wanted to write songs that sounded like they could be old standards," Silver says. "In 2002, my boyfriend at the time, Bill Bassakyros, and I started to write songs that reflected the sound of the old standards, and I thought it would be great to do an entire album of these songs."

However the timing was wrong, she says. It wasn't fashionable then to write your own songs that sound like old standards.

"Singers were putting old standards on their albums and we didn't want to. I wanted to take the risk."

Rhonda Silver

The risk paid off. Jeff Burns, president of Prism Records, heard the songs she recorded six years ago and loved them.

For Twelve Pieces of Silver, she tapped the talents of local music legends including Riley and flugelhornist/trumpeter Guido Basso. In January, she will release Miss The Chance, her latest single from the album, featuring the late Jeff Healey on guitar.

"When I was a kid, I did a lot of TV and worked with the best, so I only want to work with these kinds of guys. I'm starting to get known for my good taste in musicians," she says with a chuckle.

Silver has been performing since she was six years old and is no stranger to the recording studio. Over the years, she has sung backup for a who's who of national and international talent, including Anne Murray, Gordon Lightfoot and Bob Seger on his hit single Night Moves. On TV and in concert, she has worked such greats as Lou Rawls, Kenny Rogers, Dusty Springfield, the Beach Boys and B.B. King.

Silver just released a new single – a tongue-in-cheek holiday tune about Christmas spending between Santa and Mrs. Claus called Christmas on Credit. It was co-written with her boyfriend, screenwriter Ed Moitoso. Her son Jeremy Smith, 24, a graphic artist, designed the holiday single's cover. Given the time of year and the downturn in the economy, the song is getting extensive airplay in both Canada and the United States, and it's now available on iTunes.

"I have a strong Jewish identity and celebrate Chanukah, but I enjoy the holiday season as a whole," Silver says. "Someone suggested we write a Christmas song, since that's always what's played at this time of year."

Moitoso came up with the title and wrote the lyrics. "That made it easy for me to write the melody – it's a standard blues tune," Silver says.

For the last two years, she has performed every Wednesday through Saturday at La Castile Piano Lounge in Mississauga, playing two keyboards. She describes herself as a one-woman band. During the evening, she sings requests for patrons who want to sing along around the grand piano or kick up their heels on the dance floor.

Silver has been a fixture at simchahs in the Toronto area for years. "My mother was a bridal consultant, and my sister is one today, so I have sung at Jewish weddings, parties and bar mitzvahs, and at senior citizen homes, and still do."

When not performing or composing, she teaches singing, mainly to teenagers. For fun, Silver likes to work out at the gym almost daily and enjoys listening to a lot of jazz and blues music.

For reservations to see Silver at La Castile, 2179 Dundas St. E. in Mississauga, call 905-625-1137 or visit www.lacastile.com. Admission and parking are free.

Animated film a sober look at 1982 Lebanon war

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The first scene in Ari Folman's powerful animated documentary, Waltz with Bashir, which opens on Dec. 26, is terrifying.

A pack of vicious black dogs, 26 in all, race down a tree-shaded street in Tel Aviv, their teeth bared, honing in for the kill. The person they are chasing is Boaz Rein Buskila, an Israeli veteran of the 1982 war in Lebanon.

These intimidating hounds, a figment of Biskila's imagination, appear in a recurring nightmare that torments him. One night at a bar, he tells Folman – a character in his own film – about it. They decide that the nightmare is directly connected with Buskila's military service in Lebanon.

Strangely enough, Folman – who was a foot soldier in that war as well – can't remember his service in it either. But later that night, Folman is assailed by images of the Sabra and Shatila massacre, a pivotal event in the war.

Galvanized by these disturbing visions, Folman sets out to refresh his memory by talking to fellow vets, a reporter who covered the war and two psychotherapists.

Through this painful process, Folman reconstructs his involvement in a controversial war and recalls events that culminated in the massacre, which occurred a day after Bashir Gemayel, Israel's Lebanese Christian ally and Lebanon's incoming president, was assassinated by Syrian agents.

In Waltz with Bashir – which was screened at this year's Toronto International Film Festival – Folman takes a sober, jolting look at that war through the eyes of his fellow soldiers and re-examines Israel's role in the infamous Sabra and Shatila tragedy.

The Phalange, a Christian Lebanese militia aligned with the Gemayel family, perpetrated the crime under the nose of the Israeli army. It resulted in the murder of hundreds and possibly thousands of Palestinian civilians.

Later, the Kahan Commission released a damning report that found the army indirectly responsible for the slaughter and Ariel Sharon, the then Israeli defence minister, directly responsible for it. Tarred by the report, he resigned.

Waltz with Bashir opens on Dec. 26

Through a series of stark scenes, Folman more or less exonerates Israel of this crime. However, he leaves the strong impression that the Israeli army could have prevented it.

Although the massacre is at the core of Waltz with Bashir, Folman has plenty to say about Israel's messy war on the ground – the commandos who lay in wait to spring an ambush, the troops who fire on a civilian car, the tank commander who's shot in the neck and bleeds to death, the soldiers who rush out of their disabled tank and are mown down by enemy fire, the Palestinian boy who fires a rocket at an Israeli armoured personal carrier, the soldier who, as in a surreal dream, wanders through Beirut's airport terminal.

Waltz with Bashir, strictly speaking, is not an anti-war film. But it will leave viewers with the distinct impression that war is a terrible and ultimately futile exercise.

Flory Jagoda performs Ladino songs from the Balkans

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Flory Altaras Jagoda is one of the last authentic custodians of Ladino, the Judeo-Spanish language of her Sephardi ancestors from the Balkans.

At a recent concert at the Glenn Gould Studio, which is scheduled to be broadcast by CBC radio's Canada Live on Dec. 21 at 8 p.m, she performed a medley of soulful Sephardi and Bosnian compositions.

She introduced each song, some composed by herself, with a bit of commentary and nostalgic tales from old Sarajevo, where she was born more than 80 years ago.

A petite, grandmotherly figure, she was accompanied by her apprentice, Susan Gaeta, and by Howard Bass on guitar, Aleksandar Gajic on violin, Milos Popovic on accordion and Eric Stein on mandolin.

The two-hour concert, essentially an ode to Sephardi culture, was presented by the Ashkenaz Foundation.

She began with Buena Semana, a traditional Ladino melody, singing and strumming her guitar as she sat on a chair.

The soft, gentle songs that came next were about yearning, desire, love and disappointment from a bygone era obliterated by the Holocaust.

One of the few members of her family to survive the Nazi occupation of the former Yugoslavia, she was interned on an island camp before escaping to Italy. Toward the close of the war, she met a U.S. army officer and married him. Since then, she has lived in the United States.

Jagoda, whose personal mission is to keep alive the rich musical tradition of Bosnian Jews, sang her songs either alone or with Gaeta, whose voice is similarly sweet and lilting.

In Nights, Nights, Beautiful Nights, she sang of love, and in The Key From Spain, she eulogized her Spanish ancestors. In Remembering My Grandmother, she recalled a woman in the glow of Sabbath candles. In a tribute to Chanukah, she sang Eight Little Candles, for which she received a standing ovation.

Not all her songs, though, harked back to the pre-war period. In Sarajevo, My Golden City, Jagoda expressed sorrow over its near destruction in the Bosnian civil war:

"I watch television with an anxious soul; My golden Sarajevo is being destroyed; I never thought that this could happen; So much inhumanity and terrible cruelty."

As she finished the concert, still seemingly fresh and spry, she made a passing reference to "this wonderful music we love so much."

Judging by her performance, this is music to love, savour and preserve.

Holocaust one of many 'Jewish' DVDs released this year

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

With the year coming to a speedy end, it is time to take a look at some of the excellent "Jewish" films that made their debut on DVD in the past 12 months, including two made right here in Canada.

But before we get to that, I'd like to tell you about two TV miniseries that were released in full on DVD during the year 2008.

Fugitive Pieces is now available on DVD

Masada, the 1981 miniseries about the Jewish revolt against Roman rule in the 1st century, is now available in its complete version, as it was shown on television when it was first aired. This DVD contains the original introduction and ending, two important sections that were cut out of the VHS release. In fact, this DVD is especially welcome because the VHS release was badly edited, with entire sections cut out and other sections moved around. The result was a mess. This DVD corrects all of these mistakes.

Holocaust is the other TV miniseries that was released on DVD recently. And once again the DVD release contains the entire series in one very compact and easily handled DVD. This is a must for anyone who hasn't seen the landmark series or just wants to refresh their memories.

Theatrical films that have been released on DVD include the wonderful Israeli film, The Band's Visit. This pleasant little comedy won rave reviews throughout the world and was one of Israel's most successful films to enter the international market.

Also released this year was the Academy Award winning Austrian film, The Counterfeiters, about a group of counterfeiters who were forced to produce bogus English and American currency for the Nazis. If you haven't seen this film, you should do so now.

And then we have the heartwarming and magical Brazilian film, The Year My Parents Went On Vacation. This was the film that opened the Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF) in 2007. It tells the story of a young boy being left at his grandfather's place while his parents go underground in order to avoid arrest by the military junta then governing Brazil. What the parents did not know was that the grandfather had died suddenly a short time before and the grandfather's friends and neighbours take on the task of caring for the child.

For all the people who wanted to see The Rape of Europa, now is your opportunity. It was released on DVD in September. This too played at the TJFF and was the closing film in 2007. It is a powerful documentary about the Nazi theft of Europe's art treasures, and the allies attempts to recover and return these art works.

Also available on video is the American film, Arranged. It was shown at the TJFF in 2008 and deals with the similarities between muslim and Jewish culture as far as arranged marriages are concerned. The film tells the story of a young Jewish Orthodox school teacher who doesn't like the man her parents have chosen for her, and a young muslim School teacher who is also being married off to a man chosen by her family.

Then we get to the Adam Sandler film, You Don't Mess With the Zohan, a comedy that misses the mark on many levels, yet is interesting for being one of the first attempts by an American movie star to portray an Israeli, and it contains some exellent Israeli music on the soundtrack. It was also very nice to see Montreal born and Toronto raised Emmanuelle Chriqui who plays a beautiful Palestinian hair salon owner in that film.

And one of the best Israeli films to hit the North American market in quite some time, Beaufort, is also now available on DVD. This is the story of a small group of Israeli soldiers stationed in the Crusader fortress of Beaufort in Lebanon, just as Israel is planning to bring the last of their forces back home. In the meantime, the fortress is under constant attack by rocket bombardment and the film questions whether the casualties they suffer are worth the effort.

The two Canadian films that have been released on DVD this year are the two films that opened and closed the Toronto International Film Festival in 2007. The opening film, Fugitive Pieces, is an interesting adaptation of the best selling Canadian novel and follows a young boy who is saved from the Nazis by a Greek archeologist. The boy's experience during the Holocaust and his inability to find any trace of his family, have left an indelible mark on his mind.

The other Canadian film is Emotional Arithmetic which stars Susan Sarandon as a Holocaust survivor who now lives in Quebec and learns that the man who saved her life during the war has been released from a Soviet prison. She invites him to come visit her on her farm, which he does, bringing another survivor along with him.

Most of these films should be available at video stores. For the more difficult-to-find titles, you should get in touch with some independent video stores or try to obtain them online.

DID YOU GROW UP IN TORONTO'S ANNEX? FILMMAKERS WANT TO HEAR FROM YOU

Veteran filmmakers Marc and Marcy Stone are seeking stories about growing up Jewish in Toronto's Annex district during the first half of the 20th century. The oral histories are for Once They Were Peddlers, a proposed feature documentary about the Jewish immigrant experience from 1900 to 1945.

The filmmakers wish to collect personal stories of those who settled here as refugees from the pogroms or prewar Germany, and their children and grandchildren. To share your story, contact MHS Productions. 416-484-7092, mhspro@rogers.com.

Dinner Plus Film: Chinese And A Movie offers a kosher Chinese dinner and a screening of Woody Allen's recent film Vicky Cristina Barcelona, introduced by film maven Shlomo Schwartzberg, for "Erev Christmas." $40 advance, $45 at the door (students $25 & $28). Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, Al Green Theatre. Wednesday, Dec. 24, dinner 7:30 p.m., movie 8:30 p.m. 416-924-6211, ext. 0, www.mnjcc.org

Chai Tea: The Toronto Jewish Film Festival presents the Israeli film Galilee Eskimos (Hebrew with English subtitles) as part of its Chai Tea series. After a bank foreclosure, a kibbutz is abandoned except for a dozen senior citizens who work to keep it alive and to stop construction of a luxury spa and casino. To view the film trailer, visit the website http://wejew.com. $15 in advance or at the door (subject to availability). Sheppard Grande, Yonge & Sheppard. Sunday, Jan. 18. Chai tea 4 p.m., film 5 p.m. 416-967-1528, www.tjff.com

Two Worth Reading: In American Lightning: Terror, Mystery, the Birth of Hollywood and the Crime of the Century, American author Howard Blum builds a "non-fiction thriller" around the little-remembered bombing in 1910 of the Los Angeles Times building, which resulted in 21 deaths and scores of injuries. Besides the usual suspects, the cast of characters includes a quartet of colourful detectives, a pack of lawyers including the legendary Clarence Darrow, some motion-picture personalities including D. W. Griffiths and Mary Pickford, and several journalists including Lincoln Steffens.

The book has brought comparisons to Truman Capote's In Cold Blood for its exploitation of the true-crime, non-fiction genre and to E. L. Doctorow's Ragtime for its use of a constellation of celebrities to give the story lustre and social context. Blum's seven previous non-fiction works include The Gold of Exodus, an exploration of the off-beat theory that Mount Sinai was located not in Egypt but in the Arabian peninsula.

Sara Gruen, formerly of Vancouver, London and Ottawa, and now living in Chicago, is the author of Water for Elephants, a novel that sets a romantic tale against the well-painted backdrop of a travelling circus in the Great Depression. The human menagerie includes an assortment of oddballs, freaks, swindlers and misfits, but psychological skill must also be applied toward the animal menagerie, especially a baffling elephant named Rosie. The New York Times called it an "enchanting escapist fairy tale."

A testament to the marvels of the poet's craft

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

A recent kerfuffle over the 2008 Governor General's Award for poetry reflected the tightness of the poetry community in Canada. One of the judges, poet Di Brandt, was both a co-editor and a subject of one of the winning volume's poems.

Norman Ravvin

Though the conflict of interest inherent in judging work with which you are intimately involved made the news, one wondered how many Canadian readers reached for the prize-winning book, Jacob Scheier's More to Keep Us Warm, whether for its literary or newsworthy qualities.

The Polish poet Adam Zagajewski commented recently on poetry's contemporary predicament. Of a visit to Paris he wrote: "In the subway cars, many people are reading thick novels, even during rush hour, when cramped passengers who couldn't find a seat hover over the reader's head. Paris is after all the capital of the novel… On the other hand, poetry fares poorly in Paris. It's true that you often see posters with brief poems in the subway cars… But I don't think anyone gives them a second glance; absorbed in their thick novels, the passengers don't see them and don't want to see them."

Though Zagajewski has been compared to major figures from an earlier generation, including the Nobel laureates Czeslaw Milosz and Pablo Neruda, his work is not as well known in North America. His new collection, Eternal Enemies (Farrar, Straus and Giroux), is a slim but fine testament to the marvels of the poet's craft.

Unlike a novel (Canadians, it's often said, like theirs fat) Eternal Enemies is easily read in one sitting. Its recurrent themes are not difficult to catalogue: travel; the effect of cities, towns and countryside on the imagination; literary lives; the political and cultural legacies of postwar Poland.

Zagajewski was born in Lvov, but he writes most intimately of Krakow, the most beautiful city in Poland and one of Europe's treasures. His urban portraits express an old-fashioned nostalgia, and are most often tied to a personal sense of yearning or loss:

> I returned to the city of sweet cakes, > bitter chocolate, and lovely funerals
> (a grain of hope was once buried here),
> the city of starched memory –

Like many intellectuals and artists in postwar Poland, Zagajewski's musings are haunted by the country's absent Jews. His meditation on a major landmark in Krakow, the Church of Corpus Christi, begins:

> We're next to the Jewish Quarter, > where mindful prayers rose > in another tongue, the speech of David, > which is like a nut, a cluster of grapes.

And a poem dedicated to the postwar theatrical avant-gardist Tadeusz Kantor leads Zagajewski to consider "what it means to be a Jew, a German, or a Pole, or maybe just human…" The challenge of remaining "human" in postwar Poland is given the ironic treatment often found in the views of those who grew up under Stalin. In his youth, Zagajewski tells us:

> …the pockmarked
> Georgian still lived and reigned, > with his grim henchmen and theories.
> Those were years of memory and grief, > of sober talks and silence…

In a more overtly comic poem called The Power Cinema, the paradoxes of culture under the Soviets are evoked:

> The screen in the Power Cinema was happy to receive > every film and every image – > the Indians felt right at home, > but Soviet heroes
> were no less welcome.
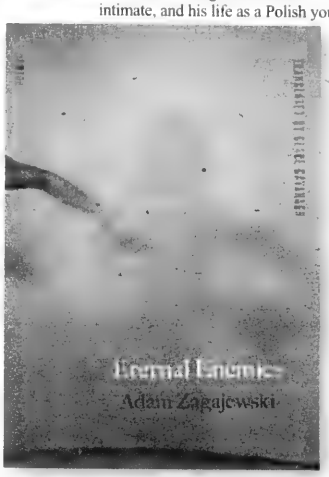
> After each showing a silence fell,
> so deep that the police got nervous.

Short passages do not do Zagajewski's poems justice, yet his method is to present a major theme, a memory or setting in a few stanzas, using short lines and concrete images. His voice is intimate, and his life as a Polish youth and itinerant intellectual (Zagajewski divides his time between Texas and Poland) is portrayed with force and clarity. Motifs evocative of the poet's time and place recur: the "electric trams" that survive in Polish cities from an earlier time; the "fat priest," somehow both a relic and emblematic; the "scrawny" and "drowsy" cats inhabiting neighbourhoods that continue to accommodate a certain wildness and unpredictability.



The poet's challenge is to make all this particular material rich and open to a reader who may only encounter it on the page. At this Zagajewski is expert. Most of us will recognize something in the sort of paternal memory evoked by the epigram that introduces In a Little Apartment: "I ask my father, 'What do you do all day?' 'I remember.'"

Norman Ravvin is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies. He is completing a novel set in contemporary Poland called The Typewriter Girl.

Coast to Coast

Former campers relive their summer experience

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — "We have travelled far, hitched our vessel to a star, but never more we'll have to roam… for we realize it was right before our eyes at Kadimah, our second home."

Nearly 300 people travelled far – from Halifax, Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston, Windsor, Northern Ontario, Vancouver, New York and Houston – to relive the Camp Kadimah feeling evoked by the camp song at a recent reunion in Toronto.

Camp Kadimah, a Canadian Young Judaea summer camp in Lunenberg, N.S., has been in existence for 65 years. Owned and operated by the Atlantic Jewish Council, it began as a place for Jewish children from the Atlantic provinces to come together in the summer and have a happy, healthy, fun-filled experience with other Jewish children. In many cities, towns and villages, there were – and still are – very few Jews, and for many, Kadimah has been the main Jewish connection available.

Over the years, as the Jewish population in Atlantic Canada dwindled, a funny thing happened. Camp Kadimah didn't get smaller or have trouble staying afloat. Instead, it has grown in both size and popularity. As alumni moved away, they began to send their children "back home" for the summer, and generations of people who never lived in Atlantic Canada formed strong bonds with the region. They, in turn, brought friends who had no other connection, but fell in love with the camp and the region.

The vast majority of Kadimah campers now come from outside the Atlantic provinces, mainly from the Toronto area. Realizing that there are so many alumni living in Toronto, some camp committee members got the idea of holding a Kadimah reunion there. Spearheaded by Michael Freedman (originally from Saint John, N.B.), who attended Kadimah from 1966 to 1980, and his co-convenor Shawna Perlin (originally from Halifax), a reunion committee was formed and the planning began.

Though the committee was hoping for 150 people, nearly double that number arrived at The Terraces of Baycrest on a Saturday evening last month. They ranged in age from teenagers (present-day campers who volunteered to help out for the evening) to senior citizens, all searching for familiar faces in the crowd.

Past camp committee chair Mark Rosen and current co-chairs Victor Goldberg, Jim Spatz and Michael Pink all came from Halifax for the reunion. Past camp directors Benny Prossin, Morty Brown, Melvin Brown and Marty Zatzman, who all live in Toronto, attended and reminisced with former camp friends.

The bonds formed by Kadimah alumni are lifelong and cross geographic boundaries.

"I believe it [the camp] had a major influence on making me who I am today, as there isn't a day that goes by that I am not reminded of something from camp," Freedman said.

His wife, Tracy Berman, grew up in Toronto and did not attend Kadimah; however, her life has been influenced by it as well. "One of the conditions of our marriage was that our children would go to Camp Kadimah, and they did," she said.

Many couples met at Kadimah, and many families have two and three generations of Kadimah alumni.

As the evening wore on, people danced to the music of The Casualties, roamed around the room to mix and mingle, watched videos and looked at the photo board. For one beautiful evening, as the snow fell outside, they were back in Nova Scotia reliving the endless summer of their youth.

Richman often considered 'greatest Jewish athlete'

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Joey Richman was all of 5 feet, 7 inches tall, weighed around 150 pounds soaking wet, and would go unnoticed on a present-day basketball court.

Obituary

But when Richman died Dec. 2 at age 93, those who came to bid farewell at Paperman & Sons knew they were saying goodbye to a man widely considered the best Canadian Jewish amateur athlete who ever lived.

Hard-muscled, trim and active in sports and athletics until almost the last decade of his life, when illness and Alzheimer's disease began to limit him, the diminutive Richman, in his prime and even in his senior years, came to personify the potential of the amateur athlete, Jewish or otherwise.

Sportswriters thought of him as "the greatest all-round sports competitor Canada ever produced," a 1978 profile in The CJN said.

"He played professional football for nine years, including for the [Montreal] Alouettes, won a Grey Cup for Toronto, coached in the Olympics," his son Mark said at the funeral.

"He coached at the Y for the Canadian basketball championships in the 1950s, ran track, played baseball, played and coached at the Maccabiah Games, which he devoted a lot of time and effort to, then later in life became one of the top seniors tennis players in the world, just to mention some of his accomplishments. There are many, many more."

In fact, Richman's death seemed like the end of an era when the YM-YWHA – during its "Golden Age" decades ago – served as the training ground for some of the best Canadian Jewish athletes of the day, especially in the wrestling ring and on the basketball court.

Richman was the youngest of eight children who grew up in what was to be Mordecai Richler territory in the St. Urbain Street area.

During the Great Depression, Richman discovered, in the gritty street where he sometimes had to fend off unsavoury types, that he was a born athlete.

"I was faster and better than anyone else," he told The CJN in the profile. "My whole life was running, jumping, fighting – and I could beat everyone. It was speed, speed, hustle, hustle. I was a very disciplined kid."

So it began. Richman played hockey and soccer and then basketball at the Davis Y on Mount Royal Avenue. He went on to take a provincial Golden Gloves title in boxing, made a pro-quality football team on a bet in the late 1930s, and continued to play football after joining the RCAF during World War II, helping his RCAF squad win the 1942 Grey Cup.

Richman then started to compete in track and field, where he again won many events.

In 1946, after being chosen as outstanding athlete in the province, Richman decided to open a sporting goods store. It was successful, but was eventually destroyed in a fire that also consumed his medals, clippings, scrapbooks and trophies.

"There was my whole life – and suddenly they were gone," he told The CJN.

In the late 1950s, he became the first person to sell Adidas athletic foorwear in Canada and was extremely successful at it.

Richman's interest then began to turn more toward coaching. He coached the Canadian women's track team at the Helsinki Olympic Games in 1952, and the Y senior basketball team from 1950 to 1957, winning the national title twice.

The Y and the Maccabi movement became the greatest labours of love in Richman's life. From 1950 on, he was the prime mover behind Canadian participation at the nascent Maccabiah Games, coaching basketball and track teams and captaining several teams to Israel.

In his 60s, Richman began to get serious about tennis, winning a number of master's titles until about 15 years ago.

Mark said that despite his dedication to sports, his father was a kind, devoted father and family man, once driving all night from Chicago to see his son play a football game.

But his father preferred amateur sports to the professional kind any time.

"The only time I was pro and got paid was between 1946 and 1948, when I played football for the Alouettes," Richman said in 1978, adding words that still seem relevant today.

"Most kids are in there playing for fame and money," he said. "I don't envy these kids today. It's different. They don't play like I did. They just don't have the spirit, the love of play anymore.

"People tell me, 'Joey, you were born 30 years too soon.'

"I say, 'No sir, I was born in the right time. When it was fun.'"

Richman is survived by his wife, Roslyn Shizgal, son Mark and sister Mattie. He was predeceased by his son Steven eight months ago.

Allen Dershowitz's (futile) fight

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

Of all the supporters of Israel and the Jewish people in the past 100 years, Alan Dershowitz may very well be the most valuable and significant.

That's because he stands for the Jewish cause in an environment that's generally filled with venomous hatred toward Jews and Israel. In the academic domain, where thinkers, writers, lecturers and media personalities regularly make a name for themselves by taking a stand against the Middle East's lone democracy – and where, increasingly, joining the club hinges on one's stance vis-a-vis Israel – Dershowitz stands strong, steadfastly and tirelessly fighting the good fight.

New Views

One marvels at his success in arguing against notorious Jew-haters and against less conspicuous anti-Semites who hide behind the shield of the "anti-Zionism-doesn't-equal-anti-Semitism" defence. But the reason he has become the go-to guy when it comes to standing up for Israel is actually quite simple: he sticks to the facts. While his opponents spit out claims against Jews and Israel based on the most tenuous data and illogical twistings of the mind, Dershowitz cites historical precedents, quotes reliable sources and extrapolates rational conclusions.

This is why his 2003 book, The Case for Israel, was so successful. In it, Dershowitz calmly and methodically explained why the accusations against Israel – that it's a monstrous human-rights violator and the main obstacle to peace in the Middle East – are wrong. Almost scientifically, he set out various accusations against Israel, named the accusers and then proved them wrong.

In his latest book, The Case Against Israel's Enemies: Exposing Jimmy Carter and Others Who Stand in the Way of Peace, Dershowitz has provided another valuable tool for defenders of Israel. In the spirit of the title, the author takes on former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, who has made a habit recently of calling Israel an "apartheid" state. Others on his hit list include academics Norman Finklestein and Noam Chomsky, as well as the culture of suicide within Islam, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, hard-right bigwig Pat Buchanan, and professors John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt, authors of The Israel Lobby and U.S. Foreign Policy.

Dershowitz makes two main arguments against this mob: (a) their facts are wrong, and (b) some of them actually are anti-Semites. Regarding Carter, Dershowitz explains why Israel is not an apartheid state – that, for example, it provides equal rights and opportunities to Jewish and Arab citizens, and it offers aid (and has offered peace) to its Palestinian neighbours. When it comes to people such as Buchanan and Finklestein, Dershowitz dismisses their anti-Zionism as barely concealed anti-Semitism – one of his oft-repeated accusations against Finklestein and the like is that they accuse Israel of genocide (a claim Dershowitz convincingly parries) while conveniently ignoring the ongoing human rights travesties around the world. To claim that Israel is the only genocidal, racist state in the world, Dershowitz argues, amounts to blind hatred of Jews, not mere hatred of the Zionist state.

The Case Against Israel's Enemies is rational, well thought out and entirely convincing. But one questions whether there is any real value in writing a book like this. The Israel-Arab conundrum is, after all, understood by most people as a fairly black-and-white issue: you either support one side or the other. Rarely is anyone willing to offer a more nuanced approach, because to wade into the grey area of the issue means giving legitimacy, however small, to the other side.

In a very real sense, then, Dershowitz is fighting a useless battle. Those of us who are in agreement with his basic premise don't particularly need his books to tell us what we already know, and those who disagree with him won't pay any attention to his arguments anyway.

There's an element of tragedy to this. Because when all is said and done, and for all his hard work, Dershowitz's good fight may ultimately be a futile one.

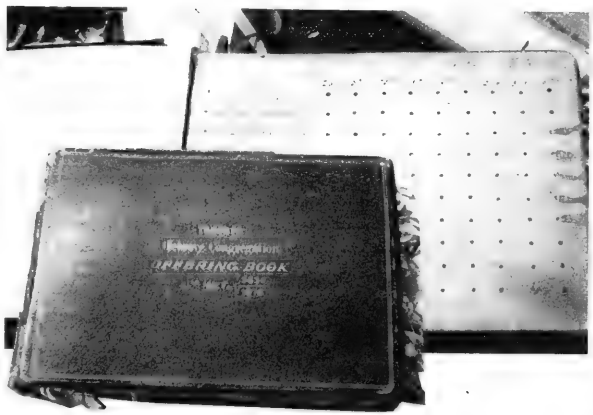
REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE



Holy Blossom Temple, once also known as the Toronto Hebrew Congregation, used this Victorian-era Offering Book in 1876 to record pledges made by members for the honour of an aliyah – being called up to the Torah during Shabbat or festival services. The cover and some inside pages are shown. Beside each congregant's name was a series of holes representing pledge amounts from 25 cents to $5. A needle and ribbon were pulled through the correct hole. [Courtesy Holy Blossom Archives]

Fear: like the nocturnal stranger

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I suffered a heart attack in July, and it scares me more today than it did when I had it.

URBAN WRITER

Like many people, I remained calm as it was happening, to the extent that I asked the paramedics to turn the siren on, saying, "If I'm going to be in an ambulance, I want the full treatment." They acquiesced.

Throughout the angioplasty, the week of recovery in the hospital and the weeks following, I wasn't scared. I did what many people do when faced with a crisis. I relaxed and chatted with myself, saying: "Everything will be cool if you just stay cool." So I stayed cool. (I did get scared after my angioplasty, thinking that if I sneezed, I might cause another heart attack. I just sneezed as I wrote this and was reminded of that).

But today, five months later, fear has settled in where it was absent before. It has, because time has dismissed my immediate survival needs and chiselled out space so that I can I can clearly see that my body has the ability to disappoint me, to let me down when I'm not looking. It's a funny thing that way, fear is. It goes through a metamorphosis, slowly growing from within, creeping up like an apprehensive, if self-assured, nocturnal stranger, his eyes hiding behind the brim of his fedora.

A short while ago, while sitting in a room with hundreds of people at a "raw food" conference, I felt a slight pain in my chest. It was a muscle spasm, but I was scared. It was raw fear.

After I calmed down, having realized that my heart was behaving, I wondered how many people in that room were experiencing fear at the same time as I was. If I were to randomly choose a person and ask them, "Are you fretful right now about anything?" they would likely say, "Yes."

And what might be their fear? Many people are terrified of being seen, being singled out so that someone else sees or hears them. They ask themselves, "What happens if I sound stupid, or if I sound smart, or if I become so anxious that I need to run?"

This is not uncommon. In fact, when this fear is connected to public speaking, it is said, many people would prefer to die rather than take the podium. (My sister told me not to be afraid in a packed room, because everyone is thinking about themselves, not me. I speak publicly on a regular basis, and knowing this made a difference. But it did so not because I used this knowledge to set myself free, but instead to reinforce my dome of safety.)

Many of us were brought up to be invisible. We were of the generation when "children should be seen and not heard." Such nonsense. So we did what they told us to do. We became indistinguishable, and when we got big, we didn't know how to voice our opinions when we should, or to stand up for our rights or someone else's. We were afraid of our own existence.

If you're scared, you're not alone. Jacob in the Torah was afraid of Esau, his brother. Esau was likely afraid of his own wickedness. The Jews were afraid of the Romans, and the Romans of themselves. Your parents are fearful of bad parenting and being unmasked "for who they really are." The vegetable woman is terrified that you might dislike her and stop buying her tomatoes, cucumbers and roses.

Remain calm throughout, and later on as well. But know that you're not the only person in the room who's scared of something. Happy Chanukah.

Chanukah 5769: A light unto the world

By BARUCH COHEN
Special to The CJN

In loving memory of Malca

Despite the never-ending clouds of anti-Semitism and anti-Israel propaganda that hang over the Jewish People, we remain, davka (particularly), joyful in welcoming the Festival of Lights.

Chanukah, which literally means dedication, tells the story of the Maccabees' brave battle for Jewish beliefs, values and traditions. It is a story of Jewish commitment, vitality and dynamism. Bravery and unflinching adherence to the values of the Torah's teachings characterize the heroism of the story.

The Maccabean movement of some 2,300 years ago was not simply the result of an elitist dislike of tyranny and crime. It was, rather, a fight to safeguard and strongly affirm our Jewish identity and way of life. It was a fight for Judaism, its values and its existence.

Today, as then, we must continue to fight in the spirit of the Maccabees.

The waves of hatred that we are witnessing today focus not only on the State of Israel, but on the Jewish People, wherever they are. The message and lesson of Chanukah, clear to anyone who is familiar with the Book of the Maccabees, enable us to rekindle the spirit of our beautiful tradition and give the younger generation of Jews the strength to continue to be a light unto the nations.

History chose Jerusalem as our capital city, dedicating it to the Jewish People.

We Diaspora Jews are also on the front lines. We must never let the dark days repeat themselves. This is our Chanukah calling: to unite with our sisters and brothers in Israel and the world over, and to proclaim, "No more killing of Jews! Never again!"

This triumphant festival of the Jewish People's dedication and re-affirmation is a festival designed to show the world that we are one people: Am Yisrael.

Golda Meir's career spanned Israel's history

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

David Ben-Gurion, the first prime minister of Israel, jocularly described her as "the best man in the government." Golda Meir, tough, persistent and outspoken, was a constant presence in a succession of Israeli governments.

Meir, who died 30 years ago this month, served Israel almost continuously from 1948 until 1974.

Prior to Israel's emergence as a state, she headed the political department of the Jewish Agency, the pre-state Jewish government in Palestine.

For a brief period after statehood, she was Israel's ambassador to the Soviet Union. Then, from 1949 to 1956, she was the minister of labour. Promoted to foreign minister, she held that job until her retirement in 1966.

Returning to politics after successfully battling cancer, Meir was named secretary general of the ruling Mapai party, the precursor of today's Labor party.

Meir became Israel's fourth prime minister, and the first woman to hold that post, with the death of her predecessor, Levi Eshkol, who had been her patron. She held that position from 1969 until 1974, resigning under duress in the wake of the Yom Kippur War.

She died in Jerusalem on Dec. 8, 1978, and was buried on Mount Herzl.

Born Golda Mabovitch in Kiev in 1898, she was the daughter of a carpenter. Moshe, her father, sometimes had to board up their home in anticipation of a pogrom, and such memories formed her, as she suggested in an autobiography.

Like many Ukrainian Jewish breadwinners of his era, Moshe Mabovitch immigrated to the United States so that his children would have a better future, free of the angst of anti-Semitism. He settled in Milwaukee, Wis., and his family followed in 1906.

Meir was a precocious student, graduating as valedictorian of her class. Strong-willed and independent, she left home at the age of 14, going to Denver to live with her married sister, Sheyna.

It was there that she met her future husband, a sign painter named Morris Myerson. She married him in 1917 after he promised to live with her in Palestine.

She was introduced to Zionism in Denver. Meir joined Young Poale Zion, a Labor Zionist youth movement that later became known as Habonim.

Unable to make aliyah due to World War I, Meir spent these years delivering fundraising speeches on behalf of Poale Zion. In 1921, she and her husband left the United States.

In Palestine, a British Mandate, the couple first lived on a kibbutz. Like most newcomers, she toiled in the fields, the chicken coops and the kitchen.

The kibbutz, however, was not for her, and soon enough, she was chosen its representative to the Histadrut labour federation.

Meir sent on a peacemaking mission disguised as an Arab woman

After leaving the kibbutz and settling in Jerusalem, she was elected secretary of the Pioneer Women's organization. This required her to spend a lot of time in the United States. Her husband stayed behind, and eventually, they grew apart and divorced. She never remarried.

Upon her return, Meir was appointed director of the Histadrut's political department, one of the most important positions in the Yishuv.

After World War II, she headed the Jewish Agency's political department. Among other tasks, she was in charge of negotiations with the Mandate authorities.

With tensions rising in Palestine, she was dispatched to the United States on a fundraising mission. The Yishuv, the Jewish community in Palestine, needed funds to buy arms for the expected conflict with the Arabs. She raised some $50 million, impressing her boss, Ben-Gurion.

On the eve of the first Arab-Israeli war, she was sent to Transjordan on a peacemaking mission disguised as an Arab woman. Her objective was to persuade King Abdullah to remain neutral in any conflict.

When the king countered that the Yishuv should delay proclaiming statehood, she is said to have replied, "We've been waiting for 2,000 years."

As it happened, Meir's mission was partially successful. During the war, the king's British-trained army, the Arab Legion, focused its energies on capturing the West Bank, which had been allocated to the Palestinian Arabs under a 1947 United Nations partition plan.

A model for newly-independent Africans

During her lifetime, much to her regret, Israel and Jordan remained enemies, though highly placed representatives from both sides maintained regular contact. Only in 1994 did Israel and Jordan finally sign a peace treaty.

When Ben-Gurion declared statehood on May 14, 1948, she was one of 24 signatories of the historic declaration of independence. She cried as she signed, knowing full well that she was making history.

As Israel's first envoy to the Soviet Union, Meir caused an uproar when she attended a High Holiday service in a Moscow synagogue.

She was mobbed by thousands of Jews chanting her name, prompting Joseph Stalin's paranoiac government to further crack down on organized Jewish life in the Soviet Union.

Elected to the Knesset, Meir was subsequently appointed minister of labour in Ben-Gurion's Mapai coalition government.

During this period, she supervised massive housing and road-building projects in a bid to modernize the country and prepare it for new waves of immigration, the raison d'etre of Zionism.

Ben-Gurion named her foreign minister in 1956, succeeding Moshe Sharett.

Meir forged relations with African nations and extended aid to them. She believed that Israel's experience in nation-building could be a model for newly independent Africans.

As she put it in her autobiography: "Like them, we had shaken off foreign rule. Like them, we had to learn for ourselves to reclaim the land, how to increase the yields of our crops, how to irrigate, how to raise poultry, how to live together, and how to defend ourselves."

As well, she played a role in defending Israel at the United Nations in the aftermath of the Sinai War, launched by Israel in collusion with France and Britain after Egypt nationalized the Suez Canal and threatened the Jewish state.

Diagnosed with lymphoma, she retired, only to return as secretary-general of the Mapai.

With Eshkol's death on Feb. 26, 1969, Meir succeeded him as prime minister.

She had her work cut out for her. Israel was engaged in an increasingly deadly war of attrition with Egypt along the Suez Canal. There were also skirmishes with Syria, and Palestinian terrorists were launching hit-and-run raids from sanctuaries in Jordan.

The fighting in the Sinai Peninsula, conquered by Israel during the Six Day War, was of the utmost concern to Meir because Soviet military personnel were helping the Egyptians, both on the ground and in the air.

Golda Meir plants a tree outside Jerusalem in 1966.

Fearing that this localized war might drag the United States into an armed clash with the Soviet Union, the U.S. secretary of state, William Rogers, convinced Israel and Egypt to accept an American peace initiative that would end the war with a binding ceasefire.

The truce went into effect in August 1970, about a month after Israeli pilots downed five Egyptian MiGs piloted by Soviet aviators.

Shortly afterward, Israel massed troops on the border with Syria following an incident in which Syrian tanks crossed into Jordan and threatened to alter the balance of power in the region.

In 1971, the new Egyptian president after Gamal Abdel Nasser, Anwar Sadat, issued a peace plan. Israel's defence minister, Moshe Dayan, wanted to engage Egypt, but Meir was not interested.

"How can we return the territories?" she said. "There is nobody to return them to."

Meir's attitude to the Palestinians was just as dismissive and short-sighted. "There were no such things as the Palestinians," she asserted.

After 12 Israeli athletes were killed at the 1972 Munich Olympics, she ordered the Mossad to hunt down the Palestinian masterminds of the assault.

Steven Spielberg's film, Munich, and a TV movie, Sword of Gideon, are loosely based on these events.

Meir was sorely tested yet again in the days leading up to the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Israel had received first-hand intelligence from King Hussein of Jordan and other Arab sources that Egypt and Syria intended to attack Israeli forces in an attempt to regain the Sinai and the Golan Heights.

Israel's chief of staff, Gen. David Elazar, urged Meir to launch a pre-emptive strike on Syria, but Meir demurred, fearing Israel would be branded as the aggressor.

After the three-week war, the Agranat Commission cleared her of direct responsibility for Israel's lack of preparedness. But amid the recriminations and political fallout, she decided she had no alternative but to quit.

She resigned on April 11, 1974, bowing to "the will of the people." Her successor, Yitzhak Rabin, was a former chief of staff of the Israel Defence Force and a junior minister in her cabinet.

Meir spent her last remaining years defending Israel at home and abroad. In one of her final appearances, she delivered a speech in Toronto.

Her story still resonates, and a an array of actors, from Anne Bancroft to Valerie Harper, have portrayed her in plays and movies.

But there was only one Golda.

Golda Meir was laid to rest on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem on Dec. 12, 1978

University of Manitoba plans archeological dig in Israel

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

The University of Manitoba is planning to participate this summer in major archeological excavations in Israel at Tell es-Safi, 13 kilometres northeast of Kiryat Gat, about halfway between Jerusalem and Ashkelon.

Archeologist Haskel Greenfield, an anthropology professor at the university is organizing a field school at the site for people interested in receiving credit toward a university degree or volunteering to dig for pleasure.

"We are looking for volunteers from all over Canada," Greenfield says. "The site is famous because it is now considered to be the biblical site of Gath, one of the major Philistine cities described in the Book of Samuel and the Book of Kings. This is where Goliath came from. The Philistine army that was fielded against David came from this town.

"In the early 20th century, the biblical Gath was originally identified as a mound that is right near Kiryat Gat, but that was a mistake," he says. "Archeologists realized this mistake about 20 years ago... The Israeli development town of Kiryat Gat [established in 1955] was given its name because it was thought at the time that the mound next door was ancient Gath."

There's a joke among archeologists working in the region that "Kiryat Gat needs to be renamed Kiryat Not Gat," Greenfield says.

Archeological excavations at Tell-es-Safi.
[Rhonda Spivak photo]

Greenfield says the Philistines were only one of many people who lived at the location. "It seems the site was settled between 5,000 and 6,000 years ago. It became one of the urban centres by 4,700 years ago, which is the time period that I'm looking at. The site was occupied during the Middle Bronze Age – the time of the biblical patriarchs – by the Canaanites, and during the late Bronze Age, it was occupied by the Canaanites as part of the Egyptian empire."

Greenfield, who is excavating pre-biblical ruins from the Bronze III period, "before the time of Abraham," made a significant discovery this summer at the site.

"We uncovered the complete skeleton of a domesticated ass, which is approximately 4,500 years old. It is very unusual to find a complete intact skeleton. It was found in the fill of an early Bronze III house," he says

"The finding tells us that this is a time when people are transporting goods by asses before camels. Before this time, they would have used oxen. There were camels in the region but they were wild and not domesticated at this time," he notes.

The excavations at Tell es-Safi are being led by Aren Maeir, professor of archeology at the University of Bar-Ilan in Ramat Gan.

Greenfield's wife, Tina Greenfield, who has a master of anthropology degree from the U of M and specializes in biblical archeology, is also excavating at the site.

"The dig is unique because so much evidence of people's daily life and activities has been uncovered," Tina Greenfield says. "For example, excavators have found olive oil-making workshops, workshops with loom weights for weaving, bone tool workshops. Haskel and I anticipate that we could dig there for the next 10 years.

"In the ruins of what was a street with houses running off it, archeologists have uncovered three levels of disposition. They'll find people's personal effects. You never find this stuff," she adds.

Greenfield says there will be a cost for people who want to join U of M's field school at Tell es-Safi, although accommodations will be provided at the nearby kibbutz of Revadim.

"It will be an absolutely great experience." he says.

Anyone interested in participating in the excavations can contact Greenfield at greenf@cc.umanitoba.ca.

2,000-year-old gold earring found in Jerusalem

Isranet

JERUSALEM — A 2,000-year-old gold earring inlaid with pearls and precious stones was discovered last month in archeological excavations in the Givati car park at the City of David, in the walls around Jerusalem National Park.

The excavations are being carried out by the Nature and Parks Authority and the Israel Antiquities Authority. They're being underwritten by the Ir David Foundation.

The earring, which is made of a coiled gold hoop, has a large inlaid pearl in its centre. Connected to the hoop are two identical gold pendants, each of which is adorned with one emerald and pearl. The emerald is held by a kind of gold cap that connects it to the main hoop by means of a small hoop that is also fashioned from gold. Another pearl that's relatively smaller than the one inlaid in the upper hoop is attached to the other side of the emerald. The pearl is fastened to the emerald by means of a gold finding, which passes through a tiny hole that was drilled into it.

Gold jewelry inlaid with precious stones was common throughout the Roman Empire

"The earring was astonishingly well preserved, so much so that it seems it was manufactured only yesterday," explained Dr. Doron Ben-Ami, who, along with Yana Tchekhanovets, is directing excavation at the site on behalf of the Israel Antiquities Authority.

"The data we have available today about jewelry and the manufacture of jewels in the ancient world indicate that the earring, which was discovered in the ruins of a building which dates to the Byzantine period [in the fourth to fifth centuries CE], was apparently originally produced during the course of the Roman period [between the first century BCE and the beginning of the fourth century CE]," Ben-Ami said.

Gold jewelry inlaid with precious stones and pearls was used throughout the Roman Empire, from the Roman provinces in the east to Britain in the west.

Earring is astonishingly well-preserved

One of the most detailed and impressive sources of information that was preserved from this period are the Fayum portraits in Egypt, Ben-Ami noted.

These drawings, which decorated the tombs of the mummies at Fayum, present an entire gallery of images of the deceased dressed in their best attire and wearing expensive jewelry. In the portraits of the women from Fayum, they are wearing gold earrings and necklaces that in most cases are inlaid with pearls and emeralds, reminiscent of the earring discovered at the City of David, and it seems that they were fashioned in a similar technique, Ben-Ami said.

A year ago, a large building that dates to the end of the Second Temple period was exposed in the excavations at the Givati car park.

Based on evidence from the writings of the historian Josephus Flavius, the building that was uncovered was probably erected by the Hadyab family. The most famous member of that family was Queen Heleni, who converted to Judaism and moved to Jerusalem, where she was buried.

Film chronicles rise of gay rights activist Harvey Milk

By STACEY PALEVSKY
Jewish News Weekly of Northern California

SAN FRANCISCO — Sharyn Saslafsky remembers getting that awful phone call. She was at home on Nov. 27, 1978, when a friend called to tell her their friend Harvey Milk had been shot.

"Turn on the TV," he urged.

Saslafsky was in disbelief. Even now, she can still recall Milk's energy, optimism and humour. She often went into his store just to say hello.

Though her friend and fellow Jewish gay activist has been dead for 30 years, on Dec. 1, at the Kabuki Cinemas in San Francisco, he lived again.

"Sean Penn was just fantastic – at times, he became Harvey," she said after seeing the film Milk for the first time. "It was just extraordinary."

Milk is currently playing in theatres across Canada.

Saslafsky, who now lives in San Francisco, was one of 170 people to attend a special screening of the highly acclaimed film. It chronicles Milk's rise from 1970s activist to ground-breaking politician: Winning a seat on the San Francisco Board of Supervisors in 1977, he was the first openly gay man elected to public office in a major American city.

The screening was organized by the San Francisco-based Jewish Community Federation and co-sponsored by the San Francisco Jewish Film Festival and Congregation Sha'ar Zahav in San Francisco. It was preceded by short speeches by Saslafsky, a longtime member of Sha'ar Zahav, and four others.

"I had the good fortune of going into Harvey and [his partner] Scott's photo shop more than once. Opera music was always blaring, and we'd speak in Yiddish," Saslafsky told the audience. "Not really good Yiddish, but whatever we could remember from when we were kids."

Other speakers were Avi Rose, director of Jewish Family and Children's Services of the East Bay; Deb Kinney of Equality California; Peter Stein, director of the San Francisco Jewish Film Festival; and Daniel Sokatch, director of federation.

All addressed the importance of learning from Milk's life and legacy, and of continuing to fight for equal rights in the aftermath of last month's passage of Proposition 8, which amended California's constitution to define marriage as being between a man and a woman.

"When you watch the movie tonight, you'll see that Milk did what we have to do," Kinney said. "He was always educating, always reaching out… We have to come out to each person we know and keep the conversation going."

Rose recalled arriving in San Francisco in the late 1970s, when "every day felt like we were making history." He was involved in the "Lost Tribe," a group of young gay Jews who fought against the Briggs Initiative (Proposition 6), which would have made firing gay teachers, and any public school employees who supported gay rights, mandatory. The initiative failed by more than a million votes. Rose recalled dancing in the streets of the Castro (the neighbourhood where San Francisco's gay community is concentrated) thinking of Milk as a "gay Jewish icon."

And so it was strange to watch Milk's on-screen joy, knowing that 30 years after that success, the gay rights movement he led would suffer a major setback with the passage of Proposition 8. "This defeat still stings, and it serves as a wake-up call to everyone," Rose said. "We can't be complacent. There is power in being out and visible.

"We Jews are good at remembering, it's one of the reasons we're still around," Rose added. "So let us never forget the legacy of Harvey Milk."

Milk begins in 1970, just before Milk (Sean Penn) and boyfriend Scott Smith (James Franco) move to San Francisco, where they rent an apartment and open a camera shop. The local merchants association shuns the gay-owned business, so Milk starts his own group, the Castro Village Association.

Milk, a long-haired hippie, realizes that the gay movement needs one of its own in public office. He runs for San Francisco supervisor in 1973 and loses. He cuts his hair, shaves his beard and swears off marijuana for a second run and loses again. He takes a stab at State Assembly, with no better luck.

With each campaign, Milk grows more fiery, passionate and confident as a leader and voice of the gay rights movement. He marches through the streets with a bullhorn and counsels young gay men to come out to their parents, friends and colleagues.

In 1977, he finally wins a seat on the board of supervisors. A year later, Milk and Mayor George Moscone are assassinated by Supervisor Dan White (Josh Brolin).

As the credits rolled at the screening, the audience applauded.

"I found the movie very inspiring," said Tsipora Prochovnick, 18, a senior at the San Francisco School of the Arts and a member of Sha'ar Zahav. She worked on the No. 8 campaign and said that had the movie Milk come out before the Nov. 4 elections, the results might have differed.

Sharon Papo and her wife, Amber Weiss, who married in June at San Francisco City Hall and volunteered on the No. 8 campaign, were heartened by the film.

"I've felt devastated since Proposition 8 passed, but the film rejuvenated and reinspired me," Papo said. "And to see it with Jews from all walks of life makes me very proud of my Jewish community."

Embassy in Tel Aviv screens Canadian's film about disability

By MARK ELLIOTT SHAPIRO
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — Bonnie Klein has directed a landmark documentary about the pornography industry from a woman's point of view.

Not a Love Story: A Film about Pornography, made for the National Film Board (NFB) of Canada in 1981, was a ground-breaking film because it presented the subject from a female perspective for the first time.

Klein's documentary Shameless: The Art of Disability, which she directed for the NFB in 2005, 18 years after she had stroke, is equally ground-breaking.

Canada's ambassador to Israel, Jon Allen, and his wife, Clara, hosted a reception and screening of a shortened version of Shameless at the Canadian Embassy in Tel Aviv on Nov. 11.

It was fitting that the screening took place on Remembrance Day, when Canadians remember the soldiers who gave their lives for Canada and the world. Like Remembrance Day, Shameless is a reminder. Rushing through our daily schedule, we sometimes forget those who cannot move as fast as we can – those of us who use a wheelchair, a walker or crutches to get around. Shameless helps us remember them. However, it does much more.

The film, which Klein called a "pajama party," has five subjects, including Klein, who frankly discuss their lives as people with disabilities and, more importantly, display how, despite disability, they are creative artists.

David Roche is a standup comedian; Catherine Frazee is a poet, scholar and lecturer; Geoff McMurchy is a dancer and choreographer; and Persimmon Blackbridge is a sculptor and writer. Klein is also the author of an award-winning book, Slow Dance, about her life the first three years after her stroke, and she is the co-founder of the Society of Disability Arts and Culture.

Shameless is about how people with disabilities see themselves and how society sees them. Nili Broyer, a project initiation director at the Jerusalem-based Center for Independent Living, said, at the screening, that "disability is not only determined by our bodies – it is primarily determined by social contexts." She noted that people with disabilities "internalize the image society has of them."

Klein told The CJN that people see Shameless and "they say that they will never look at a person with a disability in the same way."

Why did she decide to expose herself so candidly in this film? "I made the film because I lived everyone's worst nightmare, and I learned that disability is not the end of the world. In fact, living with a disability and knowing other people with disabilities have been, for me, an exhilarating and creative experience," Klein said.

"So I wanted to introduce my new friends to my old friends, who were scared by what I went through."

There was also a "subversive" motive for making the film, she said. During the panel discussion about disability art that followed the screening, Klein told the audience that she and the other participants in Shameless wanted people to be a little jealous of them. Viewers, she explained, have said they envied the sense of community the participants have.

At the screening, Daniela Brafman-Cohen, director of the Center for Independent Living and a painter, noted how important art is to her. In art, she pointed out, there are no people with disabilities, and art can be an important vehicle for making the public aware of the problems and needs of people with disabilities.

Brafman-Cohen said that art can also be a unifying factor. "Art can remove the borders between human beings – we are all disabled or, conversely, we are all able."

Panel members were either people with disabilities or individuals who work with people with disabilities. In addition to Broyer and Klein, the panel members were Tamar Borer, a dancer and artist who continues to dance, perform and teach despite a car accident that she said she appreciates and curses at the same time; Adina Tal, who heads Nalaga'at (Please Touch Me), which is based in Jaffa and is the only blind-deaf theatre company in the world; and Sola Shelly, co-founder and president of ACI, the Autistic Community of Israel. Borer, Tal, Shelly and Brafman-Cohen agreed that art must stand on its own merits, regardless of who produces it and whether that person is with or without disabilities.

Klein thanked the ambassador and his wife for their support in bringing her film to Israeli audiences. She said she is proud to be Canadian, to be Jewish and to be disabled.

Israel uses the arts to sell its brand

By MERAV FIMA
Special to The CJN

In contrast to traditional public diplomacy – hasbarah – in Israel, which endeavours to explain the country's policies and thus garner the political support of world leaders and decision-makers, the foreign ministry's new initiative, Branding, aims to attract ordinary individuals to Israel in order to gain economic dividends.

This is achieved by "pushing people to action" and is measured by increased tourism and the consumption of Israeli products and artifacts such as Israeli food, technology, literature and music, says Zehavi Appelbaum, project co-ordinator at Israel's ministry of foreign affairs.

For the first time in 60 years, Israel is taking an active role in defining its own brand, instead of passively allowing others to determine it, Appelbaum told a group of 30 young Jewish journalists participating in Do the Write Thing, a program co-sponsored by the World Zionist Organization's Hagshama department, the Prime Minister's Office and the American Jewish Press Association.

While the notion of a bunker inhabited by armed, bearded men, as depicted by the news media, remains at the core of Israel's image, it no longer stands on its own. A successful, multifaceted brand now evokes Israel's variegated landscapes, aromatic wines, medicinal technological inventions, avant-garde artworks and creative choreography. Thus, while acknowledging the Arab-Israeli conflict, Israel shifts the spotlight to its rich culture and diverse traditions, to the very things that make Israel attractive and special.

Last month's General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities of North America (GA), a gathering of federation leaders, professionals and volunteers held at the Jerusalem International Convention Center, was a perfect opportunity to implement this new strategy. Although the conference dealt primarily with fundraising methods, given the current economic crisis, as well as with Israel's delicate socio-political situation, each of the plenary sessions featured live musical performances by talented Israeli youths from all over the country.

'A Taste of Israel'

Judging by the audience's swaying, waving of Israeli flags and singing along, these interludes deeply moved and inspired them, and consequently, may have been even more influential than the panels and lectures.

Throughout the four-day event, particular emphasis was placed on the cultural contributions of the diverse ethnic communities integral to Israeli society. During the opening gala, two young violinists of Russian origin performed a concerto by Antonio Vivaldi, and a group of girls from Netanya demonstrated a traditional Ethiopian dance, appearing as a project of the Moran Choir, established to foster greater compassion and unity among the Jewish people.

Emphasis placed on cultural contributions of diverse ethnic communities

In addition, one session was devoted to the screening of Zrubavel, the first Israeli film by an all-Ethiopian cast and crew, winner of the Best Drama prize at the 2008 Haifa International Film Festival.

By highlighting the achievements and different artistic styles of each of these groups, the GA displayed Israel's diversity and the elements that make its culture unique.

"A Taste of Israel" offered attendees the opportunity to experience the delights and distinct aromas of Israeli cuisine. Participants enjoyed Carmel wines, Roy's chocolates and Lin's Farm spreads and jams, among other treats. These temptations stimulated all five senses, increasing the likelihood that participants would support Israeli products.

On the day before the conference closed, a series of day trips culminated in the Tel Aviv Café at the Sarona Gardens. Several stages were erected to host local musicians, singers and actors, while beret-clad young artists drew quick caricatures of brave sitters near a gallery of Nahum Gutman's paintings juxtaposed with old photographs of the city.

According to Member of Knesset Isaac Herzog, the event was held in celebration of Tel Aviv's 100th anniversary and of its status as Israel's cultural capital, an assertion challenged by Jerusalem's new mayor, Nir Barkat in his plenary address the previous day.

Barkat pledged to reinstate Jerusalem as a vibrant cultural centre by supporting local artists through such initiatives as the Start-Up Troupe, which took part in the Jerusalem Dance Festival that week, giving an exclusive performance to GA participants. Such projects, establishing a contemporary Israeli narrative by artistic means, undoubtedly contribute to Israel's branding.

Although an important aspect of branding consists of recognizing one's liabilities, specifically Palestinian terrorism and the legacy of the Holocaust, Israelis have demonstrated that even these can be presented more sensitively through artistic intervention.

One of the GA's breakout sessions, "The Drama of Holocaust Survivors in Israel," began with the Testimony Theatre's performance of To Tell in Order to Live, directed by Irit and Ezra Dagan. A collaboration of Holocaust survivors and third-generation Israeli high school students re-enacted the survivors' stories, this production moved the audience to tears.

"It is unbelievably moving," said one GA participant, Aviva Movshovitz.

According to David Silberklang, editor-in-chief of Yad Vashem Publications and one of the session's three panelists, "artistic interpretation reaches far more people than any other medium," and therefore, international awareness of the Holocaust and empathy for Israeli suffering are raised by exporting such productions abroad.

Though most attendees of the GA already admire Israel and constantly help with their monetary gifts, it is a good model for them to take back to their home communities and attempt to implement there, in order to enhance Israel's image.

As Israeli President Shimon Peres said in his plenary speech on Nov. 17, "perfection is contrary to existence. If we want to exist, we have to understand that imperfection is occasionally a condition to a lengthy life."

These words capture the very essence of branding: striving to portray Israel in a positive light by highlighting its cultural and technological accomplishments, without concealing its imperfections.

Montrealer Merav Fima recently participated in Do the Write Thing, a program for young Jewish journalists at the General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities of North America.

Latkes from the yellow book

By FERN SWEDLOVE

Did you know that many Jewish cooks have a special yellow book to refer to? No, it's not the yellow pages, but something much more important.

I made this discovery at a recent synagogue dinner while we were talking about latkes, herring salad, and whether the herring comes from polluted water. Curious to know where Mrs. Rosenberg's herring salad recipe originated, I asked for the source, and she quickly responded, "Why, from the yellow book!"

The pause that followed was like dead air space. For me, it was more like a slow panic, as my mind raced through all the books I could think of that had a yellow cover. Lucky for me, my Jewish mother antennae were working that day – I had just been poring over all of Norene Gilletz's cookbooks, trying to figure out how to cope with the massive number of latkes I had to make for Chanukah. Tentatively, I answered, "The Pleasures of your Processor?"

A quick nod was all that was needed. I had passed Go and was now in the loop. Clearly, for both Mrs. Rosenberg and myself, this cookbook had reached an iconic level. But were we the only people who were in love with everything Norene Gilletz had ever written? And if only the colour of the book had to be mentioned to identify it, maybe this was a pretty important phenomenon to understand?

My curiosity was piqued. Over the next few days, I spoke to anyone I knew who cooked or had an operational kitchen. Invariably, the yellow book was in everyone's kitchen and had broken through the glass ceiling of cookbooks. This cookbook was not just your local women's chapter fundraising effort; the book was a first to reach a national audience, a first to capture the spirit and love of generations of Jewish Canadian cooks, as well as the first cookbook to stay open and not topple over because of its wonderful binder design.

But what about the latkes? And are Winnipeggers the only ones who are crazy about Gilletz, a native daughter who was born and raised here?

Luckily, I was able to chat with Gilletz, who confirmed that the yellow book has been an all-time bestseller.

Although the yellow book could not be duplicated because of the high cost of the binder design, the second, updated edition (titled The Food Processor Bible), which is white, has gone on to sell more than 35,000 copies to date.

The yellow books are now collectors' items and have been known to turn up on eBay and are hoarded by bubbies to pass on to their grandchildren. Gilletz has heard countless stories of people passing along her cookbooks to the next generation complete with food stains on treasured recipes, wonderful smells and elastic bands to hold the pages together. Husbands have commented that brides should carry it down the aisle when they get married, as it may be the most important ingredient of a successful marriage, Gilletz said.

Besides the obvious merits of the yellow book, what may have mattered the most when this book was published was that it finally freed women or men from the oppressive task of grating mounds of potatoes each year. My bubbie used to remind us before we gathered each Chanukah for our feast that there was always a little blood in her latkes from the endless grating needed to make them for the growing extended family.

Latkes for the dogs?

Sure, the food processor is not the panacea for the whole latke conundrum. There are alternatives: latke mix, frozen prepared latkes, catered latkes costing over a dollar each, or shredded potatoes at the meat department in some grocery stores, but can they actually compare to the real deal?

Not really, Gilletz says. These aspiring latkes are too heavy, too greasy, too square, too unhealthy, and the list goes on. And now we have to worry about the glycemic index, which is a looming menace ever present in her new book Norene's Healthy Kitchen, which introduces us to the pleasures of vegetable latkes, smoked salmon latkes and chocolate latkes.

But for Gilletz and me, the old fashioned potato, onion, egg and oil concoction is still the king. And Gilletz's dog, Maizey, and our dog, Daisy, also agree. Why is this, I asked Gilletz?

"Food transports us back to the time and to the table where people made the latkes. The smells and flavours come back. Food connects people. We want to preserve that," she said.

I followed Gilletz's latke-making tips each step of the way. This year, I left the peel on the potatoes, pulverized the onions, lined the finished products up like little soldiers in a loaf pan for freezing and reheating. Voila, before I knew it, my husband and I had made the 200 latkes for the first gathering.

I made a toast to my Bubbie Rachel, who spent countless hours making latkes for my family well into her old age. First, I gave thanks for not having to grate the potatoes by hand, and then I thanked my bubbie for planting the seeds that led me to continue the latke tradition with my family and friends.

Borat's brother releases a Chanukah CD

Songs in the Key of Hanukkah is a collection of songs that brings the ancient music of Chanukah kicking and screaming into the 21st century.

It is written and produced by composer and multi-instrumentalist Erran Baron Cohen, brother of actor Sacha, who portrayed Borat in the popular movie Borat: Cultural Learnings of America for Make Benefit Glorious Nation of Kazakhstan.

Baron Cohen scored the music for that film, including the Kazakhstani national anthem.

"Songs in the Key of Hanukkah is a record that takes Chanukah music to a place it's never been before," Baron Cohen says. "It's a musical voyage that bears repeated listening both for adults and kids who will love to hear the re-workings of the songs they already know."

The songs combine klezmer, reggae, electronica, hip hop, tango, pop and other genres, all fluently woven into something uniquely Baron Cohen's.

The album contains five reinterpretations of classic favourites, as well as five original tunes created exclusively for this project. All the songs are in English, Hebrew or Ladino.

Guests include Israeli superstar Idan Raichel, world-music diva Yasmin Levy and New York City rapper Y-Love.

The seed for Songs in the Key of Hanukkah was planted a year ago when New Line Records president Jason Linn went shopping for a Chanukah record for his father. Linn noticed how many Christmas records existed, yet how few there were that celebrated the Jewish holiday. He found some, but they were mostly kitsch. Linn met Baron Cohen at a première for Borat and the record was born.

New discoveries strengthen proof of Herod's grave

Israel

Analysis of newly revealed items found at the site of the mausoleum of King Herod at Herodium (Herodion in Greek) have provided Hebrew University of Jerusalem archeological researchers with further assurances that this was indeed the site of Herod's first-century BCE grave.

Herod was the Roman-appointed king of Judea from 37 to 4 BCE who was renowned for his many monumental building projects, including the reconstruction of the Temple in Jerusalem, the palace at Masada, the harbour and city of Caesarea, as well as the palatial complex at Herodium, 15 kilometres south of Jerusalem.

On the basis of a study of the architectural elements uncovered at the site, researchers have been able to determine that the mausoleum, among the remains of which Herod's sarcophagus was found, was a lavish two-story structure with a concave-conical roof about 25 metres high – a structure fully in keeping with Herod's status and taste. The excavations there have also yielded many fragments of two additional sarcophagi, which the researchers believe to have belonged to members of Herod's family.

The podium of Herod's mausoleum as it is today.

The mausoleum, said Prof. Ehud Netzer, director of the excavations, was deliberately destroyed by Jewish rebels who occupied the site during the First Jewish Revolt against the Romans, which started in about 66 CE.

Also found in the latest excavations are the remains of an intimate theatre just below and to the west of the mausoleum, with seats for some 650 to 750 spectators, and a loggia (a kind of VIP viewing and hospitality room) located at the top of the theatre seats and decorated with wall paintings and plaster mouldings in a style that has not been seen thus far in Israel.

The style is known to have existed in Rome and Campania in Italy, and is dated at between 15 and 10 BCE. Thus far, only one wall-painting scene has been found intact, though there are traces of others in the room.

Herod chose this location

The dating of the wall paintings makes it reasonable to assume that the construction of the theatre might be linked to Roman general and politician Marcus Agrippa's visit to Herodium in 15 BCE, Netzer said. The theatre and its lavish loggia were deliberately destroyed for the creation of the conical artificial mount that constitutes the widely known popular image of the Herodium site and that apparently was built at the very end of Herod's reign.

Netzer is convinced that Herodium would never have been built had it not been for Herod's known determination, made at the beginning of his career, to be buried in this isolated, arid area. He undoubtedly personally chose the exact location for his mausoleum, since it overlooks Jerusalem and its surroundings.

This led to his decision to make the entire complex the crowning glory of his building career and to name it after himself.

The extensive site, which probably will not be fully excavated for many years to come, if ever, includes a huge palatial complex, the theatre, and a "country club" of sorts, including a large pool, baths and gardens, in addition to Herod's burial installations and mausoleum. The palace was the largest of its kind in the Roman world at that time and must have attracted hundreds, if not thousands, of guests each year, Netzer said.

A description of Herodium, as well as of Herod's funeral procession there, can be found in the writings of the ancient Roman-era historian, Flavius Josephus.

The excavations, being done on behalf of Hebrew U's Institute of Archaeology, have been conducted with the assistance of the Israel Exploration Society, with contributions by individuals and the Yad-Hanadiv foundation. There also has been financial aid from the National Geographic Society. Also collaborating in the excavations are the Israel Nature and Parks Authority and the Gush Etzion Regional Council. The Israel Museum will launch an exhibition of the findings there in 2010.

Netzer is hopeful that with the further findings at Herodium, there will be increased visits to the site by Israelis and tourists, and that the overall area might be converted into a national park.

Happy Chanukah

Digging up a new Chanukah tradition

By NANCY LISS
Special to The CJN

On the evening of Dec. 21, Jews everywhere will light the first candle of Chanukah, also known as the Festival of Lights.

It's a time marked by family gatherings, chanukiyah candles burning brightly, the delicious aroma of latkes, and the sounds of children's laughter as they spin their dreidels and collect their Chanukah gelt. But this year, Chanukah will hold a very personal meaning for me, as there's something tangible connecting me to history: a discovery found deep within the earthen floor of a dusty cave.

This past summer, my husband and I travelled to Israel on a highly recommended Isram tour. One stop on the itinerary included taking part in an archeological dig an hour's drive southwest of Jerusalem. The site is called Tel Maresha in Bet Guvrin National Park. A tel, we were told, is a flat-topped mound or hill, containing layer upon layer of ancient civilizations built upon one another.

Descending the dusty, earthen stairs into a cavern below ground was not exactly what I had in mind when I dreamed of visiting the multicultural sites of this ancient land. But with bucket and shovel in hand, we were invited to dig into the soft limestone floor, promising to turn over to the authorities anything we might find. Imagine our excitement when, one by one, we unearthed shards of pottery and pieces of bone implements.

It's believed that Tel Maresha holds the remains of a city dating back to biblical times and is the site of the ancient Maccabean civilization of the Chanukah story in the third and second centuries BCE. The great event took place during an era that predates the Roman occupation of the Holy Land, and follows a time when Judea (modern-day Israel) was ruled by Alexander the Great of Greece.

During the period of Alexander's rule, the two cultures coexisted peacefully, but when Alexander died, the area was thrown into turmoil. Jews who didn't assimilate were persecuted, and to make matters worse, the new despotic king, Antiochus, forbade the practise of Jewish traditions. He ultimately destroyed the Holy Temple. A great battle ensued between the greatly outnumbered Jews, led by Judah the Maccabee, and the pagan Hellenists.

The Maccabees, brave defenders of monotheism – the belief in the existence of one God – managed to defeat their oppressors. When they recaptured the Temple, finding it in ruins, they immediately set about to rebuild it.

Within the darkness, they managed to find a tiny bit of oil, which miraculously burned for eight days – hence the symbolic tradition of lighting the chanukiyah for eight nights.

At Tel Maresha, there are hundreds of caves dating from the Hellenistic period of 2,200 years ago. Instead of hiring archeologists to dig within the caves, tourists become archeologists for a day – and they pay for the experience!

Half the finds become souvenirs

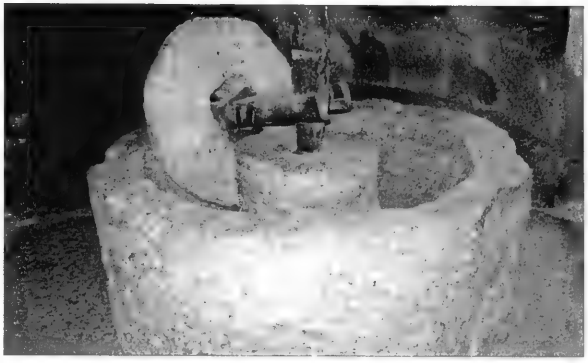
It's actually a brilliant self-supporting business, run by Israel's Archeological Seminars Institute and licensed by the Israel Antiquities Authority. The company was founded more than 25 years ago by archeologists Bernie Alpert and his wife, Fran (who were originally from Chicago), along with archeologist Ian Stern from New Jersey, and historian Asher Afriat, an Israeli native.

After introducing himself to our tour group, Bernie Alpert handed each of us a shovel and a bucket and invited us to start digging. He showed us how to distinguish shards of pottery from hardened clumps of earth. All discoveries were dumped into a giant sieve to sift the relics from the loosened soil.

Anything of value goes through a meticulous process of sorting and classification before the ancient pieces are glued together to recreate bowls, vases, vessels and utensils of this lost civilization. More than half of the finds are discarded and placed in a large pile for tourists to take home as souvenirs.



An ancient olive press within the cave. Olive oil was once as important a commodity as petroleum is today.

Alpert is quick to say that no one is claiming that the shards of pottery we unearthed actually came from a particular cup or bowl belonging to Judah the Maccabee, but they did come from the same soil where the Maccabees lived. Examining the shards of pottery in our hands, we realized that we were holding a remnant of a past that we recall with every lighting of the Chanukah menorah.

As Alpert suggested to the group, "Next time you light the Chanukah candles, place a piece of this ancient pottery next to your menorah. They belong together."

So now, as we light the candles in celebration of the Festival of Lights, we celebrate another miracle – the discovery of a piece of history that proudly takes its place alongside our chanukiyah. It's the start of a new tradition, with special thanks to Bernie Alpert and the other archeologists at Tel Maresha.

Barcelona has a lively Jewish community

By CURT LEVIANT
AND ERIKA PFEIFER LEVIANT
Special to The CJN

BARCELONA — What a city! What a stunning city, with eye-catching buildings by the renowned architect Antoni Gaudi and with tree-lined boulevards so broad you almost have to take a taxi to get across before the light turns red again!

Barcelona is a city with museums devoted to Miro and Picasso and with acoustically and esthetically perfect concert halls such as the Liceu and the Palao di Musica. It also has superb public transportation and a citizenry that is always amiable and helpful.

Barcelona has a lively Jewish community that numbers about 3,500, with two welcoming synagogues and a school that educates about 150 students. The community has roots that indicate a thriving pre-1492 Jewish past.

We got to Barcelona indirectly. First, we took a comfortable Air France jet to Paris, revelling in the attention of the flight crew – especially attentive in the sumptuous business class – and then spent a few days in the luxurious Hotel Edouard VII Hotel on Avenue de l'Opéra, where the pampering continued. (At the Edouard VII, in the 1920s, the Lubavitcher Rebbe stayed for several months when he was living in Paris, before he became the leader of Chabad.) Following that, we took the super-swift TGV to southern France and then a local train to Barcelona. Note, in order to save money, be sure to get a Rail Europe Pass, available only in the United States and Canada (telephone 1-888-382-7245).

The facade of the Palao de Musica

In Barcelona, we stayed at the towering Hotel Torre Catalunya, with its superb views, especially from its 23rd-floor restaurant where you can see the entire city and its surrounding hills.

Before beginning to tour on your own, get a feel of the city by buying a one- or two-day ticket to the hop-on, hop-off at-will Turistica Bus, which goes to all the major sites in the city. And then, after this wonderful overview, zero in on areas that you like.

Gothic quarter is a favourite destination for tourists

The medieval Gothic quarter, where Jews resided until 1492, is a favourite destination. From Catalunya Square, walk along the lively tree-lined La Rambla, with its market stalls and street performers.

On this street is the city's information centre. As I left, a man held the door open for me. To my "thank you" he replied, "How do you know I speak English?"

I gazed at him and said, "I just looked at your face and knew." Then, after a moment's hesitation, I added, "And you know what? I bet you understand Yiddish too!" He laughed and gave me a thumbs-up sign.

Off La Rambla enter the medieval Gothic area near the old cathedral. A short walk from Jaume Square, in the heart of the old Jewish quarter where Jews lived until 1492, finds 5 Marlat St. Enter and you stand in the oldest synagogue in Europe, the Synagogue Mayor, built in the sixth century and rebuilt in the 14th. But not until late in the 20th century was this site explored, excavated and restored.

For the Sabbath, we visited the city's two synagogues. One is the Chabad shul at 27 Joan Gamper St., a 15-minute walk from the Hotel Torre Catalunya, where we found about 50 men and women attending lively Friday night services. The next morning, we took a half-hour stroll up Avenida Diagonal, passing world-class fashion boutiques, to the synagogue at 24 Avenir St., where about 60 people, including youngsters, participated.

There are no kosher restaurants in Barcelona, but arrangements for kosher food can be made in advance by contacting the Jewish centre at info@cibonline.org. The city also has many vegetarian restaurants. Search "Happy Cow, Barcelona" in Google for a complete list.

On our last day, we went to catch our train to Paris but were told about a 24-hour general strike in France. No trains were crossing the border. In a panic, I phoned the manager of the Catalunya, explained our situation and asked if we could have our room for one more day. Not only did he say yes – he even extended an invitation for the extra day without charge. Where in the world of international hotel-keeping could you match such a generous gesture?

After a week in Barcelona, it's easy to see why the past and present of this glorious, light-filled city flow into one emotive continuum.

Happy Chanukah

You can blame this Israeli for your Sudoku addiction

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN

When asked by colleagues or potential business partners, high-tech entrepreneur Gideon Greenspan says he has 25 years of experience as a software developer. Most people scratch their heads, of course – Greenspan, who has developed the world's most popular online Sudoku game, Web Sudoku, is only 32 years old and he looks much younger than his age.

"I started writing software when I was seven and started selling it when I was 17 in London," says Greenspan, an Israeli and U.K. citizen who now calls Tel Aviv home. While the Macintosh utilities that he created as a teen (covered on TechTV and CNN, among others) still see some online sales, it was Web Sudoku – built with his wife, Rachel, a statistician – that really set the world on fire.

Israeli software developer Gideon Greenspan

After laying the foundations for Web Sudoku, Greenspan very quickly invited his wife into the project. "She analyzed the puzzles and worked out the logic," he told ISRAEL21c. "She understands that side of things a lot better than I do."

Voted by Time Magazine as one of the best websites of 2008, Greenspan's game sees about 250,000 users a day, and is syndicated by American newspapers including the Chicago Sun Times Online and the Denver Post and the online portal Yahoo. The website is surprisingly simple and clean, with basic puzzle choices in levels of easy, medium, hard and evil.

Since founding Web Sudoku in 2005, Greenspan has also provided premium Sudoku downloads for Mac and PC, and a series of Sudoku puzzle books, the most popular of them sold in Germany.

But Web Sudoku isn't Greenspan's first online success. A year earlier, he released Copyscape, a plagiarism search engine that can track down copies of content and where it's published online.

Helping writers, newspapers and website owners, Copyscape keeps tabs on where their printed copy is going and offers premium services as well as free searches. Launched in 2004, it is currently used by about 200,000 content owners every month.

Other smaller enterprises created by Greenspan include Google Alert, launched in 2003 before Google came out with its own alerts, and one of the first applications of Google's original search, API. More than 200,000 people have subscribed to the service, for the in-depth results it provides above and beyond Google's offering.

Premium services, advertising and syndication sales for Web Sudoku, Copyscape and Google Alert, have allowed Greenspan to develop in a new direction, and today he's devoting his spare time and then some, to the environment.

"I've always been aware of green issues. One thing I like about the software business is that you can create a lot of economic value while consuming few natural resources. But I'm no 'tree hugger,' and my approach is pragmatic rather than ideological."

Greenspan has therefore built Carbon Catalog, the world's most comprehensive and up-to-date source of where to buy carbon offsets, the carbon credits people and companies purchase to offset the greenhouse gas emissions created by taking flights, driving cars or consuming food and energy.

"While there were tons of providers selling offsets online, I was looking for a central repository of information that compared and contrasted the providers, so I could make an informed choice about where to buy," says Greenspan.

"Eventually, I decided to solve the problem myself and created Carbon Catalog. Carbon Catalog is a directory of carbon-offset providers and the projects that they support. The listings are regularly updated, based on the information on each provider's website. Carbon Catalog also rates providers based on their transparency and the quality of their projects.

"But there's also an entrepreneurial angle. Depending on what happens in the United Nations and in America's corridors of power, the next decade could see massive growth in the carbon markets, and I'm positioning Carbon Catalog to take advantage of that. But this is for the longer term. For now, I'm focused on providing a non-commercial service for voluntary offset buyers."

Greenspan also advises a number of Internet companies on technology and strategy. He has a PhD in computer science from the Technion – Israel Institute of Science, and two MAs – in philosophy and computer science – from the University of London and Cambridge.

A few words of wisdom for those who'd like to build a high-tech company?

"I follow the Google formula," Greenspan said. "That's doing one simple thing as well as you can, and not bothering users with too many adverts or other distractions. The other running theme in my strategy is that I pursue ideas that don't require excessive upfront investment.

"I tend to do things differently and grow along with my projects."

Karin Kloosterman is the associate editorial director of ISRAEL21c, a media organization focusing on 21st-century Israel.

Memories of a child's nightmare

By ROXANA OLIVERA
Special to The CJN

Last summer, while conducting research about the Holocaust in Italy, I had the privilege of listening to the stories of survivors from Siena and Florence.

One of those stories was told by Vittorio Luzzatti, a 75-year-old survivor with whom my nine-year-old daughter and I met one evening in a Siena eatery.

As Luzzatti recounted his story in great detail, my daughter became intrigued by the childhood of this storyteller. She asked him questions that I had not thought to ask – questions that on the face of it appear naive.

She wanted to know how Luzzatti had spent his birthdays during that terrible period; whether he had any favourite toys with which he cuddled at night; whether his parents had read him bedtime stories during those nights.

Tears filled Luzzatti's eyes as his childhood memories rushed through his mind. All of a sudden, it dawned on me that the adult survivor sitting across the table was just a child during the Holocaust. It occurred to me only then that Luzzatti was telling us a human story of an inhuman time, through the eyes of a child. And in so doing, he brought us close to what it was like to be a Jewish child under fascism and Nazism.

Born in Pisa in 1933, Luzzatti was a happy Jewish boy who was proud to be Italian. His father's family and his mother's family had lived in Italy since the 16th century. Luzzatti's family, like most Italian Jewish families, was more Italian than Jewish and thought they lived in a wonderful country.

When Italy's racial laws were passed in November 1938, Luzzatti was five years old. His father, a medical doctor, was prohibited from practising his profession. His father's notice of termination of employment came in the mail, Luzzatti told us, holding a copy of the letter in his hand. Deprived of the family's right to earn a living, Luzzatti 's father and mother departed for France in search of employment, leaving Luzzatti in the care of his maternal grandparents.

Luzzatti missed his parents horribly and could not understand why they had left him behind, but in spite of the separation, Luzzatti loved being with his grandparents. He adored his grandparents' warmth and humour.

His grandfather always managed to find time to play with him. He would sit with his grandson for long hours, teaching him how to whistle, how to fire a slingshot and how to solve crossword puzzles. Luzzatti also said that nonno (grandpa) used to tell him very silly jokes. Those silly jokes, he discovered years later, were actually off-colour jokes that had been sanitized for his benefit.

Like any child of his age, he sometimes got in trouble. Once, he accidentally killed the next-door neighbour's chicken with his slingshot. His grandparents were forced to pay a hefty sum for the dead bird that, later that evening, ended up on their dinner plates.

Vittorio Luzzatti's class in the Jewish School he attended.

When the time came for Luzzatti to go to school, he was told he could not go to public school like other Italian children. Instead, he had to attend a school for Jews only.

At Jewish school, Luzzatti shared a classroom with 16 other children, ranging in age from six to 13. There was a little girl who used to refer to him as "Mr. Luzzatti," and, this, he said, always made him laugh in class.

In school, among rich and poor, religious and non-religious Jews, he had a big shock. He learned Jews were allowed to use public washrooms at specified times only, so that they would not encounter non-Jews. For Luzzatti, this was the first sign that the Italian government was training him to perceive himself as inferior to non-Jews. This had a profound effect on him, as he had never thought of himself as different from his Italian counterparts.

At lunchtime, Luzzatti often did not get enough to eat. Food was constantly on everyone's mind, as Jews were not entitled to ration cards. One of his more fortunate classmates, however, always found his lunchbox packed with appetizing sandwiches, which, Luzzatti said, occasionally found their way to someone else's belly. Most students felt, he explained, that their peer could afford to spare a sandwich every now and then, since in addition to his daily panini, he would eat six hard-boiled eggs for lunch.

"His mother forced him to eat all six eggs to make him strong," Luzzatti told my daughter, "but in all honesty, his face looked a bit green from eating so many eggs at once. Imagine that… six hard-boiled eggs a day!"

Unable to find work in France, and without a penny to their names, Luzzatti's parents returned to Italy when World War II broke out. His mother rented a room in Siena while he attended Jewish school. That arrangement didn't last long.

Luzzatti said no one ever read bedtime stories to him. He didn't get his first books until he was seven years old.

"My father was a very clever and a very intelligent man," he told my daughter, "but he had no clue about how to raise a child."

In a lighthearted tone, he added, "Picture this. He bought me two really, really, heavy books – one was about the constellations and the other one was about mechanical inventions."

My daughter replied, "They sound a bit boring, no?"

He said, "Yep. They were just too heavy. Even now, I cannot look at them. I still can't understand them."

Then Luzzatti and my daughter giggled.

At the time, nobody knew how long the war was going to last. Even worse, most people had no idea of what lay ahead for Italian, and non-Italian, Jews. But Luzzatti's father realized what was in store for Italian Jews. As rumours of an armistice between Italy and the Allies began to circulate in early September 1943, and German

Jews were not entitled to ration cards armed forces swiftly mobilized toward northern Italy. Luzzatti's father urged the family to go into hiding. "My father told us frightening stories he had heard from Jews in France, and then said, 'We'll all be slaughtered here, if we stay,'" Luzzatti said.

His family headed for the mountains. There, with the help of friends, he and his family managed to hide and avoid harm. They took shelter on a farm that produced pecorino cheese, which is made from sheep's milk. Turnips and pecorino cheese were his basic means of subsistence there. Today, Luzzatti said, he does not have the stomach for turnips or pecorino cheese.

Vittorio relates his story to the writer's nine-year-old daughter.

Confined to a small room in an attic, Luzzatti spent most of his time dreaming of roaming around in the fields outside. Since he had no toys and no friends to play with, he quite ingeniously constructed airplanes out of paper, which he used to fight the war in his imagination. In his imaginary world, his airplanes represented the air forces of the Germans and the British. His airplanes had no choice but to endure long fights against one another, he said with a chuckle. But in the end, the British airplanes always came out victorious.

In October 1943, the Nazis' hunt for Jews intensified. On Oct. 16, more than 1,000 Roman Jews were rounded up and sent to Auschwitz. In Trieste, Milan, Turin and other smaller cities, hundreds of Jews were caught, still in their homes. "But when the Nazis, aided by Fascist soldiers, came to fetch us, they did not find us," Luzzatti said. "So, it is thanks to my father that I can now tell you this story."

One of his classmates was not so fortunate. Graziella Nissim, aged 14, was deported, along with her family, on Nov. 6, 1943. The family was never heard from again. Luzzatti looked visibly upset when he showed us a group photograph of his class in the Jewish school. "Even the janitor was Jewish," he said.

When my daughter asked how he spent his birthdays, Luzzatti said, "No one thought about my birthday in those days. Everyone was too worried about the future to think of any type of celebration."

Then Luzzatti suddenly recalled an incident that took place on one of his birthdays. On that day, a group of young partisans came within the vicinity of the farm in which he was hiding and told him that they were fighting the Nazis and the Fascists. "Some of them were so young that they didn't even know how to fire their machine guns," he said.

One of the partisans accidentally threw a hand grenade near the family hiding place, but miraculously no one was injured. After that incident, the partisans shared food, a calf, with their mates in hiding. "It was there that I met the poorest and most compassionate people I had ever seen in my life," Luzzatti said. "So, looking back, I suppose that was the best birthday I ever had. Even if I didn't get a special toy, blanket, or bear to cuddle with at night."

Luzzatti's eyes welled up when he spoke about the liberation of Siena. He spoke of his first taste of freedom as he described the texture and flavour of the first magical candies that found their way onto his tongue.

As we left the eatery, Luzzatti placed a candy into my daughter's hand. Then, he whistled all the way to his car while my daughter and I marvelled at his ability to cope with a painful childhood past.

Today, Luzzatti lives in Israel. He is co-authoring Palestina in Toscana, a book about a group of religious German Jews that took refuge in Tuscany before fleeing to Palestine in 1938.

In commemoration of the 70th anniversary of Italy's racial laws, Luzzatti made a presentation at the Università per Stranieri di Siena last month.

Three excellent CDs released recently range from Margot Leverett's delightful klezmer and bluegrass fusion to the klezmer-jazz mixture of the Klez Dispensers and the edgy classical music of Kristina Reiko Cooper.

Margot Leverett and the Klezmer Mountain Boys
2nd Avenue Square Dance
Traditional Crossroads

One of my favourite klezmer CDs of recent years was Margot Leverett and the Klezmer Mountain Boys, a 2003 album that teamed Leverett, a great clarinettist who was a founding member of the Klezmatics, up with four musicians – fiddler Kenny Kosek, mandolinist Barry Mitterhoff, guitarist Joe Selly and bassist Marty Confurius – rooted in bluegrass but very much at home with klezmer music.

Could a fusion of klezmer, Jewish music rooted in eastern Europe, and bluegrass, string-band music, which developed in the American South after the World War II, work? The answer was a resounding yes.

Leverett's clarinet mixed beautifully with the stringed instruments in a set that weaved klezmer and bluegrass tunes in and out of each other. In both the Old Country and the new, klezmer musicians have intermingled with musicians from many other genres and come up with marvellous new ways of playing Jewish music and redefining Jewish music.

It's been five years, but Leverett's second collaboration with the Klezmer Mountain Boys has finally been released and the wait has been worth it. The new album, 2nd Avenue Square Dance picks up where the first one left off as it moves seamlessly from such bluegrass standards as Bill Monroe's Stoney Lonesome to traditional klezmer fare like Boreasca.

The CD features a number of stellar guest musicians interacting with the band. They include guitarist Jorma Kaukonen of Jefferson Airplane and Hot Tuna fame, legendary bluegrass singer Hazel Dickens and innovative banjo virtuoso Tony Trischka.

Kaukonen's electric guitar playing brings rock and blues influences to several tunes, including Electric Kugel, a piece he co-wrote with Leverett, while Dickens shines on Little Moses, a traditional bluegrass song about the baby found by the pharaoh's daughter who grew up to lead his people from slavery to freedom.

There are also several pieces without the Klezmer Mountain Boys that feature Leverett collaborating with such artists as fiddler Darol Anger and Klezmer Conservatory Band leader Hankus Netsky.

This album is already as much a favourite as its predecessor.

The Klez Dispensers
Say You'll Understand
The Klez Dispensers

On their third album, the Klez Dispensers offer up an enjoyable program centred on Yiddish theatre songs and their own original tunes in the klezmer-jazz tradition of Old-to-New-World masters like Dave Tarras.

Although their previous release was primarily instrumental music, about half of this set throws the spotlight on singer Susan Watts, whose jazz-inflected vocal highlights include a swinging version of Oy Mame and a torchy rendition of Sheyn Vi Di Levone. Violinist Amy Zakar and bassist Heather Chriscaden Versace add their voices to Watts' to fill out the Andrews Sisters sound needed for a typically up-tempo rendition of the almost-inevitable Bay Mir Bistu Sheyn that ends the CD.

Five of the Dispensers contribute original material. Pianist Adrian Banner's Ray Charleston combines elements of klezmer, swing, bop and blues into a sweet amalgam, while trumpet player Ben Holmes' Millville Freylekh is a delightfully celebratory dance tune. Clarinettist Alex Kontorovich's Sirba is a tour de force for his own solos and the band's ensemble playing.

But perhaps the real highlight of the CD is Goldenshteyn Sirbas, a medley of traditional tunes from the repertoire of German Goldenshteyn, the late eastern European master of traditional Jewish music, who brought a living repertoire of previously unheard Old World klezmer tunes to North America in the 1990s. The Klez Dispensers do his legacy proud.

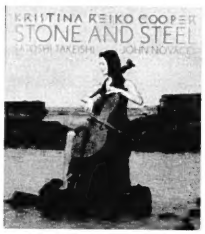
Kristina Reiko Cooper
Stone and Steel
Linus

Stone and Steel by cellist Kristina Reiko Cooper, the co-artistic director of the Israel Chamber Music Society and a professor of music at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, is a stunning classical album with a rock edge. Working with pianist John Novacek and drummer-percussionist Satoshi Takeishi, Cooper displays extraordinary technique whether on a quiet baroque piece like Dido's Lament, an instrumental arrangement of an aria from Henry Purcell's opera Dido and Aeneas, or bowing with wild abandon on composer John Dowland's piece George Whitehead's Allemand.



The album's high point comes in the title track, Stone and Steel, an 11-minute contemporary piece composed for Cooper by Patrick Zimmerli, that shifts through many moods and classical styles before coming to its jazz-influenced conclusion.

• Music note: This year's Canadian Folk Music Awards ceremony was held Nov. 23 in St. John's, Nfld.. The Sisters of Sheynville, an all-woman band from Toronto steeped in the Yiddish-swing music of the 1930s and '40s, won the vocal group of the year award for their CD Sheynville Express. And David Buchbinder's Odesssa/Havana, which plays a fusion of klezmer and Afro-Cuban jazz, won the world group of the year award for their album Odessa/Havana.

Israelis offered counselling on avoiding poverty

By MARK ELLIOTT SHAPIRO
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — According to an ancient Chinese proverb attributed to Lao Tzu, founder of Taoism, if you give people a fish, they will have enough to eat for one day, but if you give them a fishing rod, they will have enough fish to eat for an entire lifetime.

Chaim BePlus, a unique Israeli charitable organization founded in November 2006 by former Torontonian Mindy Ajzner, doesn't give charity at all – or at least not in the traditional sense. Instead of helping needy people emerge from mounds of debt, it teaches young Israelis how not to get into debt into the first place.

Or, to revert to that Chinese proverb, Chaim BePlus not only gives the teenagers and young adults in its programs, offered in various places throughout Israel, a fishing rod, but also teaches them how to use it sensibly, how to be economical when buying and using bait, and how important it is to put some of the catch in the deep freeze – for a rainy day or when they want to hang up their fishing rods for good.

In a recent interview with The CJN, Ajzner, a graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto and Ulpanat Orot Yeshivat Bnei Akiva in Toronto, said, "Seventy per cent of Israelis live with an overdraft, which is the first step towards economic downfall in the family."

A reception was held recently in the residence of Canada's ambassador to Israel, Jon Allen, and his wife, Clara, that showcased Chaim BePlus. At the reception, Allen noted how, soon after his arrival in Israel, he became aware of the widespread problem of overdrafts in Israeli society.

Certain things that we, the members of today's global consumer society, take for granted should not be. For instance, going on a vacation that will be paid in 12 instalments after returning from the trip. Very unwise, said Ajzner, who also has some practical and sensible tips about apartment buying for young Israeli (and perhaps Canadian) couples.

She said, "According to the experts in personal finance, you shouldn't buy an apartment until your oldest child is in Grade 1. Why? Because, number 1, you are more established professionally and you know what your income is, and you are more realistic about what you can afford. And, number 2, until your kids go to school, you don't know where you want to settle down."

If you do not wait until they go to school, Ajzner cautioned, "then you end up buying and selling apartments as you try out different neighbourhoods and as you lose money through the transactions due to taxes, realtors, lawyers and money expenses. Therefore, you should rent as cheap as possible until your children start school."

At the reception, moderated by Edwin Slonim, a consultant to Chaim BePlus, the organization's message was graphically presented. In addition to a video on Chaim BePlus, Ajzman's son, Simcha, used magic tricks to show what it tries to accomplish.

The reception's keynote speaker, Iris Stark, a partner in an accounting firm in Ra'anana and vice-president of the Institute of Chartered Public Accountants in Israel, spoke about what the Israeli government should do in the economic sphere. She noted that, at the individual level, we are "equally responsible" for budgeting our income, planning personal saving, and investing in long-term, low-risk financial products. We must make every effort to avoid the temptations of luxuries we cannot afford."

Aiming at Israelis aged 17 to 25, Chaim BePlus defines its mission as training and empowering young Israelis in personal financial responsibility. Ajzner told The CJN that Chaim BePlus teaches its participants to adopt a "take charge of life" attitude.

A recent Chaim BePlus information sheet states that "the cost of teaching life skills at a young age is far less than the cost of supporting and rehabilitating people in financial distress. Thus, Chaim BePlus offers a cost-effective way to prevent poverty and ensure long-term financial stability."

In his Mishneh Torah, Maimonides writes, "Of all the prescriptive commandments [mitzvot asseh], we must be most meticulous in the commandment of giving charity."

Maimonides said that there are eight degrees of charity and that the highest degree is "to support other Jews whose economic situation has deteriorated, to give them a money grant or a loan or to enter into partnerships with them or to offer them jobs that they can carry out, so that they can finally stand on their own two feet and no longer have to ask others for help."

Perhaps, if there had been an organization like Chaim BePlus in Maimonides' time, he might have added a ninth degree: preventive charity, or teaching people how to avoid poverty's pain, hardship and humiliation.

Chaim BePlus is a unique way of caring for other Jews and a new twist in the performance of the commandment, "Love thy neighbour as thyself."
